THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 17, 1902. NO. 651.

THE SPIRITUAL STATUS HAS RISEN.

No doubt those who have read your calls, and invitations to this meeting to-day have said, "Oh, yes!—the mystics of the city will celebrate! Shall we go?" "Shall we feel at home?" I think so, friends; for as long as pain and death and mystery are in the world humanity will always be one, and at heart a mystic. We come not as outcasts from religion, but as free men, free women, as sons and daughters of one common creative force, into this house of rejoicing. We are among those who read, think, try to lead correct lives, and we are conscious of a range of thought, and personal dignity which assures us that the spiritual status of man has risen! "We walk to-day a nobler earth." Our world does improve. It grows wiser, it gains in justice, it talks about fraternity and it really is a pleasanter place than it used to be.

You look doubtful! You are thinking of the mad struggles of the little egos to force their way to the best places. Of their inability to gain them. Of their cries of defeat. Of the great golden god who scantily feeds them with his jeweled hands, but sets his yellow feet upon their necks.

You shake your heads. You tell me red-headed and red-handed war has "gang his ain gait" of late, and we are wildly following on to help him. We want to sell our noble horses for it, we will raise mules to sell for it, we do not discourage our boys, for the nations will fight, and they can't fight without soldiers; from enlisting, to help out, even foreign nations. Too often it is Greed, draped in the banner of Freedom, who leads them into the business of wholesale murder, politely called war, and now often they learn too late,

"'Tis not for their flag they are fighting,
'Tis not for their country they die!
The greed that is born of ambition
Misleads with its patriot cry.

"O, agony pent in that moment,
When on-rushing foemen are seen,—
The yearning for home, and its loved ones,
The billowy distance between!

"O, heart-ache, and anguish of mothers,
For the dying, alone in their pain,
Not even the boon that was Rizpah's
To guard from the vultures their slain!"

Yes, it is a sad fact we cannot deny, but if the present reveals the brazen, audacious, blood-spattered fiend of war still active, we may look backward at former activities and learn how much worse were his methods than they are to-day. Yes, our world is a pleasanter place than it used to be. It has advanced physically, intellectually, morally, and within the past five decades what a vault it has taken into the realm of spirituality. It is wonderful. It is such a delightful change to feel that the inhabitants of earth and heaven are coming year by year closer together.

To know that we do not lose our great and good men and women when they pass to the land of souls, and to feel that they do not lose interest in us. It is one of the most sacred of boons to feel that in life and in after-life we may do as the great Shakspeare advises—

"The friends thou hast, and their adoption tried, Grapple them to thy soul with hooks of steel."

We may do this; they aid us; they aid the world they love. It used to be so different before the science of the interchange of thought between the two worlds was outwrought. At death everything stopped short until the judgment day.

An iron door shut the departed soul into a new country; no message could ever reach the loved ones left on earth, no word be spoken to comfort or assure. Maybe some chance dream might come in the hours of night to revive memory; maybe the soul might catch a glimpse of a silent ghost of some departed friend among the tombstones; but few hoped for even that. Love's deal was closed—dismally, heart-brokenly closed until the trump of Gabriel should awaken the quickened dead.

When I was eight years old my maternal grandmother, whom I loved as my mother, suddenly died. She was not very aged, was several years younger than I am at present, and we had none of us ever come to think we could live without her gentle presence. But her hour had come—she knew the call. I remember she called me to her bedside and smiling, gave me a beautiful little box on the cover of which was a bewitching picture of a little girl playing with her pet kitten. She knew I liked the bright colors and she said: "Here, Emma, this is yours now—don't forget grandma—be a good girl—good-bye!"

She smiled herself asleep. Then there was the funeral, the gloomy crape, and not the tributes of beautiful flowers which we have at such times now. Old "China" was sung. The minister worked on the feeling of the mourners, my mother fainted, and dear grandma was left under the blanket of brown, in a windowless house in the ground.

We were never to see or hear from her until the last great day. Oh, the coldness of it all!

On Sunday afternoons, after church, my mother and her brother, my dear uncle Isaac, used to give a sacred hour to her memory. By the way, you will allow me to make this come near to you by telling you that this same uncle Isaac of mine married an East Cleveland lady, the sister of Halsey Doan, of Standard Oil fame, and she only a few weeks ago passed on to the Great Beyond.

On those Sunday afternoons they used to go into the little parlor, close the door and on a table lay out the precious trifles left for memory's sake. The tress of hair, the piece of the shroud, a few things grandma had worn, some old letters she had written them in absence, a flower she had pressed, and after they had looked at them, wept over them and sung some of her favorite hymns, they put them tenderly back in her big bureau drawer to lie with sprigs of sweet clover and dried rose leaves until another Sunday. They used to let me set my pretty box with the girl and the kitten on it, on one side of the table and sit with them.

If they had only known what we know now about making the angels happy! Now, instead of turning to the inanimate trifles lying in dark drawers for consolation, we say we must try to hear from them; we must endeavor to give them an opportunity to write us a letter! They long for us as we for them.

Modern Spiritualism has kindled the hope in the hearts of all classes of mourners, in the churches and out of the churches, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the wise and the ignorant, that after death seals the mortal lips the soul can yet speak, if given proper conditions. It yet loves, and will talk if there is a law in the universe by which it can do so. Do you not feel that truth?

The Bible confirms the fact that there is some law, or chain of laws, by which mortals and immortals can sometimes see each other—sometimes talk to each other. Modern Spiritualism has held up this golden truth to the eyes, and comprehension of pain-racked, hungry-hearted humanity. It was a beautiful hope in a cradle made of the roses of love and the lilies of purity; and the angels from the highlands of heaven have watched it, and fed it, until it has arisen in the strength of a Christ, and preached the glad gospel to all nations.

The world has "caught on!" It believes! It acts! It thinks new thoughts! It speaks new discoveries; it makes use of new methods. It is not afraid. It has unconsciously put itself into the same condition of mind as was Eben Holden when he wrote his own epitaph, which I think is as good for a scrap book as for a tomb stone. It reads thus:

"I aint afraid.
'Shamed of nuthin I ever done;
Always kept my tugs tight;
Never swore 'les 'twas necessary;
Never ketched a fish bigger'n 'twas,
Er lied in a hoss trade,
Er shed a tear I didn't hev to;
Never cheated anybody but Eben Holden,
Goin' off somewhere now,—dunno the way nuther—
Dunno 'f it's east, er west, er north er south,
Er road er trail,
But I ain't afraid."

This is plain, comic embodiment of the reasonable, common-sensible idea that a life of honesty, integrity and good works counts.

Despite what the creeds teach, the soul about to depart, having a consciousness of this is not afraid. He says to sorrowing friends, "Good bye! You will hear from me if I can make it possible."

And the friends he leaves are going to hear from him if they can make it possible. Neither are hopeless. There is a system established; instruments are trained and cultivated which help to make intercommunion possible.

At first there is a desperation of grief which fetters reason and cripples caution. The search for means by which to gain news from the dead is gone about with a "Damn the expense" air which leads to the professional mediums for materialization, and the various phases of phenomenal demonstrations at stipulated prices. These are sometimes very exorbitant, especially when spirit portraits are offered to the investigator. But at those times of bereavement the utter worthlessness of all sublunary things is full upon us, and money seems of no account compared with nearness to those gone from our sight.

This recklessness is a stimulus to fraud, and the extravagant demand made upon the psychic is another. But these things regulate themselves in time and good comes out of it all.

When our angel friends know how much we desire them they will not fail us, and they, like ourselves, will learn that silent communion of soul with soul in the home is the real comfort of the varied experiences gone through with in search of angel companionship.

The dearest seasons of communion are when we can, as do two friends clay-clothed, meet soul to soul, and silently exchange thoughts and aims, helping and strengthening each other; exacting nothing, expecting nothing, but only rejoicing in the loved presence.

To do this we must learn to concentrate our thought on the friend whom we wish to call. Sometimes we can do this by the help of physical objects. A picture of the dear one, a flower once loved, a letter, love-freighted, anything which will help to concentrate will upon the one desired. Take a pen and as the spiritual thought, or question comes to you write a response, so it can be read by spirit eyes. It may be easier than reading your mind. It will give you comfort and peace. It suits the needs of mortals as well as immortals and is the essence of high spirit communion. I said in the beginning that if we are called mystics by the other combinations and aggregations of our fellow mortals, we are in thought free men and free women. We speak as we think, and we criticise where we think criticism will awaken thought. We are willing to take as much as we give. We are transmitting our independence of thought, our doubts, our denials to our children; to all who come within our influence. We are taking away old props of faith, and prayer, and trust.

Are we teaching them to stand alone? Do we make them know how deep and strong is truth? How much superior to the mere pastime which religion offers? Do we realize that they are companionable and need associations? We implant our freethought. We teach honesty and we despise hypocrisy. What are we doing to make it possible for the children coming on to take our places to be honest and independent thinkers? Are we furnishing them good healthy organizations? teachers of whom they are not ashamed? Commodious and handsome places for congregating as are used by other organizations? If not, we are neglecting some very important things in making them stand fast and dignifiedly on their conclusions. If we want them to stand firm we must give them something to stand on. We can do this. Will we?

You have thought, and thought, alone;
You have grown, and grown, and grown;
You've opinions of your own;
Speak them out!
You have reasoned long and well
In your brainy citadel;—
Outgrown evils which befell,
Now speak out!

Let the world know where you stand,
Love and wisdom, hand in hand,
Lead the soul to highlands grand;—
O, speak out.
Many earnest ones would know
How to shackling sins outgrow;
Tell them kindly what you know!
Dare speak out.

Do not pause to veer, and please!
Cowardice is heart disease.
Would you feel a royal ease?
Then speak out!
Feel at heart life's sacred worth,
Let it in your life shine forth,
East and west, and south and north,
O, speak out.

Work to cleanse and educate;
Soften, sweeten, elevate;
Work before it is too late.
Soul speak out!
Do not fear the darkbrowed throng;
Lead the lagging ones along;
Order "Forward!"—loud and strong,
O, speak out.

An Old Veteran Passed On.

Dr. William Cleveland passed from the material to the spirit life, on the first day of May, at Minneapolis, Minn., at the advanced age of 81.

Fortunately he was not a great or long sufferer. Only about four weeks ago he visited St. Paul to attend the Spiritualistic mass-meeting held by the Minnesota State Association, in which Dr. Cleveland took great interest, though somewhat feeble in health at that time. On returning to his home in Minneapolis, he was taken sick and prostrated with paralysis of the limbs, which proved fatal. As soon as this was known many of his friends in Minneapolis and St. Paul visited him frequently and did all that was possible to minister to his needs in the last days of his mortal life, and he expressed gratitude to such friends for their kind and thoughtful remembrance and attention in the hour of need. He was heard to express the wish that he might be permitted to go soon as possible to his spirit home where he felt that friends on the other side, especially his angel wife and daughter, were waiting to receive him.

According to his expressed wish the funeral exercises were conducted by the Spiritualists at the grave in Lakewood cemetery. This was done on Saturday afternoon. Quite a large number of Spiritualists, both from Minneapolis and St. Paul were present. By request, Mrs. Anna Shaft, of Minneapolis, officiated. She spoke feelingly of Dr. Cleveland's life and character, his unfaltering faith and good work in the cause of Spiritualism. Mrs. Shaft was followed by Mrs. J. P. Whitwell and Mrs. John Sauer, of St. Paul, and Mrs. Jacobs, of Minneapolis, all offering their tributes to the memory of our deceased brother. Much is due Brother Maxwell, president of the Minnesota State Spiritualist Association for his zeal and interest in rendering material assistance to Dr. Cleveland in his last sickness, and in taking charge of the funeral exercises; he sent out notices to the Spiritualists in the Twin Cities requesting them to come and pay the last tribute to the mortal remains of our aged brother. Mrs. Jacobs and others contributed beautiful roses which were strewn over the form and twined around the head of our brother, as he lay in the casket.

As is well known among the Spiritualists in the Twin Cities, Dr. Cleveland has been for many years a steadfast believer and worker in the cause of Spiritualism. When in good health he was a successful physician and magnetic healer, and many people in the Twin Cities can testify to his wonderful healing powers, and performed through him by the spirit forces.

The Doctor has contributed considerable to the literature of Spiritualism. He has written interesting letters and articles, which have been published from time to time in The Progressive Thinker, and which were perused with interest by its many readers. He wrote and published a book entitled "The Religion of Modern Spiritualism, and Its Phenomena," which had quite a large circulation among Spiritualists especially in the Twin Cities.

The writer has been personally acquainted with Dr. Cleveland for a number of years, and can testify as to his steadfast faith in the cause, which he loved so well. There is no doubt that our brother has now found the Spiritualistic doctrine and truth about as he expected to find and experience them; and that he will from the other side, as an apostle of the true faith, seek to strengthen and extend its principles and its truth in this material world, so that Spiritualism ultimately may become known and honored as the true faith and religion among all mankind.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

It Bears No Relation to Theology or Dogma.

Among the many correspondents who have asked in your columns that vital question, "What is religion?" none seem to examine the word etymologically, or recognize the root of its derivation. Religion is always confounded with theology and dogma, to which it bears no relation. It is quite generally, though incorrectly, supposed to express worship of some anthropomorphic Deity, who, because of such adulation, furnishes the devotee with a free passport to Paradise. The pious or sanctimonious person who punctiliously attends church, prayer meetings, or communion service, observes fasts and ceremonies, has been labeled as religious, and therefore those broad, progressive souls of our more liberal faith who have outgrown these forms, unjustly and unwisely spurn the very word—religion. But is there no danger that in their iconoclastic desire to purge all chaff from the healthier soul-life of the present age, they may lose much of its ripening wheat alone?

Religion is a very innocent word. Its root, "religare," was used by the Romans when they wished to signify "to bind again, or anew," not to hold in bondage, but in welcome reunion. Religion therefore in its primal, rightful significance, merely implies the conscious reunion of the spirit of man with the Great Spirit, or Breath of all Life, and this not as a theory, a superstition, a theological belief, manifestation of piety, or even an ethical principle, but as a generic fact, inherent in the very nature of spiritual beings.

It is true that the natural outreaching of this impulse in the unintelligent mind, an aspiration which is fettered by ignorance and false education, has given rise to various creeds and tenets of theology representing the imperfect approach to such a union, which, in all past history, have masqueraded under the name of religion. But shall Spiritualists accept the world's misconception and abuse of this vital word any more than they do its forms and dogmas, its mistaken interpretations of Life, of Love and Wisdom? Should not a more advanced growth overcome all foolish prejudices, all tendency to undue excitement, even fierce antagonism at the very mention of religion in connection with Spiritualism? The proverbial red rag to the lord of the pasture is slighter provocation than seems this innocent cause of annoyance among disciples of the dawning light.

Yet what source of life have they save the Infinite Sea of Spirit, even when it is absorbed unconsciously, as the babe draws its sustenance therefrom? But to gain the more and more abundant life, the life which is power and mastery, there must be intelligent, vital at-one-ment with the vibratory centre, a conscious reunion with the source from whence we have come forth into mortal expression, a binding back again, a religare, or religion. From what fount of Wisdom can we drink but that Omniscience which is the keynote of all unfoldment, the Eternal Fact which underlies all Law? What makes our loves possible but the warmth and glow of a Central Flame, an Infinite Love, incomprehensible as it must ever remain to finite minds? Can we not all testify that a conscious one-ness with Omnipotent Force makes the soul strong to endure, valiant to withstand temptation, fireless to overcome the foibles and weaknesses incident to human immaturity? This is religion in the true and only correct sense.

And surely Spiritualists who, alone of all people, enjoy a blessed reunion with those who have finished their corporeal lessons, and laid aside their fleshly primers, surely they have the only religion worthy the name. It never can nor should take rank among the many systems of (so-called) religion of the past or present, where it does not belong, but Spiritualism holds generically the best and only right to the word. Let the term be purged from its theological barnacles, from its erroneous associations and lifted to its true position as recognizing the blessed possibility of fellowship regained with all spiritual sources of life and wisdom, in generic kinship with that Force underlying all Nature and her phenomena, her wondrous object-lesson of Life and Truth, exponents of a pure and undefiled religion, teaching through matter that Spirit is the only reality, the only power, and we are spirits. This is the gospel we proclaim, and exemplify. This is truly a religion, a binding anew in our illumined recognition of our oneness with the Primal Source.

The benighted theogonies of the past have served as stepping-stones to the race on which to mount to a vantage-ground where it could receive a truer light. There are many struggling souls who still need them, as they also climb higher. Those of us certainly who have left old dogmas far behind can afford to be charitable and not reject too bitterly the grain thus gleaned.

Surely if there is one thing more than another which Spiritualists sorely need it is some religious ideal, some tie to bind them not alone in a universal brotherhood of charity and good will, but to some high allegiance which shall encourage an unceasing endeavor to make of themselves all that is grand and noble and pure. To accept the fact of spirit return does not furnish or imply a spiritual growth; it almost seems sometimes to sound the death knell of all progressive impulse, as it breeds satisfaction, and hence spiritual inertia. As the animus of cold scientific investigation pervades our ranks, the cause wanes. It needs the quickening touch of Spirit. Only the true life of Spirit manifest in daily expression, the beauty and potency of spiritual realization, can warm it into healthy, growthful activity, and bring to the acceptance of all the world a pure religion of exalted spirituality.

PHARISEES AND PROPHETS

An Analysis and a Contrast.

Pharisaism is a universal, not a local phenomenon. The Pharisees are commonly spoken of as a sect; but they were not a sect; they were not a party; they were not a faction. They were the "true Israel." Their place in their time and country corresponded very nearly with the place the Puritans held in England, with the place that members of the Young Men's Christian Association hold to-day; with this difference, that the members of that association are concerned with religious matters alone, while the Pharisees combined religion with politics. Among the Hebrews of Palestine church and state were so closely connected as to be identical. Patriotism and piety went together hand-in-hand. Jehovah sole king. He made the laws and appointed the officers. He planted the institutions. The fortune of the people in all respects, in every estate, was supposed to be dependent upon fidelity to his decree. Like the children of "Islam," resigned to his will. The prophet and politician were one. Priest and ruler were the same person.

The people who saw this most clearly, and appreciated it most profoundly, felt it most essential, seized the spirit of it most vigorously, and set themselves the task of keeping the nation up to their fundamental ideas were the Pharisees.

Political and social exigencies awoke the zeal of the most earnest Israelites, who found one another out, came to a general understanding, combined forces and influence, and became known by their practical aims and purposes as the representatives of certain ideas, and leaders in certain movements. They were called "Pharisees," that is "Separatists," exclusives as we should say. The term "puritan" was probably applied to them in derision. They were referred to as the "Elect." These names became fixed upon them and at last were accepted and borne in good faith.

They certainly did claim to be distinguished by loyalty to the Hebrew traditions, by devotion to the Hebrew faith, by allegiance to the Hebrew commonwealth. They claimed regard on the ground that they were the true servants of Jehovah and the true friends of his people.

They constituted a "Native Hebrew Party." They detested the Roman power as a usurpation. They abhorred the publicans who collected taxes for its support. They had no patience with the Sadducees who dabbled in pagan politics and tried to introduce into Jerusalem the culture of Alexandria and Corinth. In their zeal to possess the whole truth, they turned scripture inside out, counted the chapters, the words, tortured phrases in order to drag out hidden confessions, they were determined to "fulfill all righteousness."

But for thus sacrificing the spirit to the letter they were inveighed against by the writers in the Talmud as bitterly as in the New Testament. They are called the "Dyed Ones," who preach beautifully, but act vilely.

Their formalism, bigotry, hollowness, and their assumption of moral and spiritual superiority, grew directly from the cardinal idea with which they started, the idea that they were set apart for the purpose of purifying and restoring Israel.

The Separatists were the "Elect." The "Elect" claimed the privileges of their election, and of looking down on their neighbors. This is the soul of Pharisaism.

Yet this spirit is a phenomenon of our society. There is the Philosophical Pharisee, puffed up with the conceit of his intellectual supremacy. He fancies himself living in the region of serene ideas, far above the stupidity and illusions of the vulgar herd.

He rarely comprehends the meaning of things; has an insight into the secrets of the universe.

Then there is the Scientific Pharisee, proud of his method and its results. Feeling that he and he alone is on the right path to knowledge, and that all others are widely and hopelessly astray. He looks on the philosopher as "an idle seeker after mind." He likes to "pose," to strike an attitude in the intellectual world, pronounce final judgment on systems and opinions, and discards as errors those venerable beliefs that lie beyond the province of his investigations.

Pharisees are very plentiful in aristocratic forms of society. The Pharisee of the clique or "set" is as lordly as the Pharisee of the order. His manners are the perfect manners; his morals are unexceptionable; his sentiments are correct; his politeness is the standard!

As who should say: "I am Sir Oracle, and when I ope my lips, let no dog bark." This illustrates the spirit and temper.

Everyone may recall instances in illustration.

Every profession has its Pharisees. There are such among lawyers, among physicians, and even among clergymen. Perhaps no one profession has a preeminence, though for obvious reasons the clerical profession seems to excel. The clerical spirit is the soul of that profession, and it is generally thought of as a species of arrogance. Their studies are apt to be removed from the intellectual sympathies of their fellow men. From of old they have been considered sacred studies, that imparted a kind of sanctity to the men that pursued them. This gave them a sort of holy seclusion and raised them to a pedestal of peculiar distinction. This sort of experience easily lends itself to hypocrisy and pretense. Such men are flattered and come at length to hold themselves as having more than human wisdom. Even as mouthpieces of divine wisdom.

Now over against this spirit of the Pharisee, let us contrast the real spirit of a prophet, or a genuine medium. What is the weight or authority of his word?

Authority is adequate testimony, the word of a competent witness. We call it revelation—and what is revelation? Let us free our minds from a certain confusion which seems to mystify this term. Revelation is not a word or a voice from without, but a voice within; not a prodigious communication from the aqueous clouds about the earth, but the intuition or interior perception of a rapt soul that has met the spirit in its deep meditations; its internal communings. The teacher with authority in religion or in spiritual matters is the qualified witness. It is he who has had direct intuition or perception of the truth he affirms. While the "scribes" only repeat the testimony of others, but add nothing of import to the truth, perhaps weaken it by an inadequate statement. He only speaks with authority who tells what he has seen with his own independent vision, the truth he has reproduced in his own mind, the truth which flesh and blood have not revealed, but the Living God, the Inner Light, the "Truth."

The truth thus obtained is not necessarily new, in the sense that the like had never been said before; but it is new in the sense of having been newborn in the thought or spirit of him who declares it. That makes it as fresh as the morning, the ever-new surprise of a new day. The truth that Light is God, has been proclaimed for many thousand years, but true science and true mediumship are, in our day, making it comprehensible. A truth not understood is not a revelation. To whom does it give any revelation?

Such true teachers we call "seers," signifying thereby that they see what they teach. Of such seeing the first and most essential condition is unconditional surrender to the truth—to the spirit. With the "scribes" the first consideration is not what is true, but what is written, vouched, accredited, canonical, or else what is profitable, what is best fitted to build up our denomination, to strengthen our church; not what saith the spirit speaking to me this day, but what says the conference, what says the platform, the covenant, the catechism; what has credit with the churches, what is good ecclesiastical stock.

But they whom God has destined to be his witnesses—authorities not for a day or a sect, but for all time—listen to no secondary teaching. They settle on no platform, they go straight to the Fountain of Life and listen in their souls to what God shall declare to them concerning himself. They believe that God will speak to them also, if they really wish to hear; that is, they believe in a present, living God, the Present Active Soul of the Cosmos, not merely in the tradition of a god, who appeared once upon a time, long ago.

They deliver themselves up without reserve to the truth; they open mind and heart to God's teaching, asking not what is profitable, what say the scribes—but what saith the Spirit? They seek to catch the vibrations from the Inner Life of the Whole, to the inner life of each.

From the view-point of the Intellect, one teacher has said:

"The first and most fundamental assertion made by science is the omnipresence, the omnipotence of force, acting on the primordial elements of the world. To this science has come; in this all her sons without exception agree, and this conception is purely spiritual. The nature of the force baffles investigation. What it is, none may tell; how it came to be, none may conjecture. It is not in any sense a material thing. It is not a person; yet it acts on all matter, and it possesses all the natural attributes that have been ascribed to God. It is single and insoluble. It is ubiquitous without being seen; omnipotent without violence; immanent in universe, yet permanent throughout it; it is the animating principle, the connecting bond, the soul of all relations between things. It is the very expression, the very embodiment and incarnation of will; will, blind and crude, as at first it seems, but capable of infinite expansion and determination."

From the view-point of the Intuitions of the spiritual nature, another has well said:

"Cannot the power which sustains, without budging from the spot, my personal vitality, sustain and nourish the immediate conscience of which that vitality makes me aware? I cannot hurt my health, nor tell a lie, nor commit a fraud, nor strike my brother, nor leave the beggar in the ditch, nor parade my superiority, without knowing it by direct intimation. My pains are its rebukes, my delights its sympathies, my hopes its suggestions, my sacrifices its impost, my heavenly longings its apology for haunting me forever. There is a Power in which I live and move and have my being, in which I eat, drink, breathe, sleep, wake, love and hate, marry and protect a home. Is it incapable of sustaining all my functions of true religion on the spot as well as these? Do I have these without a mediator, and must I travel for the rest? When I undertake to breathe by tradition it will be time for me to get a sense of God in the same way."—John Weiss.

No teacher acquires authority by his thought alone. No mere philosopher can be permanent authority for the mass of mankind. Their contribution to known truth will live because truth will live. We look back with admiration and reverence to the great Greek sages who said so many wise and true and beautiful things about the thought-life and duty; Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato and many others, modern as well as ancient. But what can they be to the multitude of any coming age but a vague impression, voicing truths for the mind and heart, but they seem afar off like those dim stars in the sidereal heavens—the centres, probably, of unknown systems. What the world needs in its spiritual leaders is not mental acuteness, but truth and love incarnate in the life. We want truths that we can understand and prove, if need be.

One of the great Soul Teachers has frankly told us, that all conditions are held by the law of Attraction. That Light, Life, Love, Knowledge, Goodness, are of that great Inter-Soul and Over Soul that speaks and lives in that Inner Sunlight of Being. The Living Breath of all, the Great Spirit-in-Synthesis with the matter of the universe.

The Inner life of all things, Unismal in the Cosmos, and manifold in the central life of all his creations. The outer aspects of nature give us the sensuously real,—the inner aspects give us the spiritually ideal. The outward, formal aspect leads to the minutae of the Pharisee, while the throbbing, the inspiration from the inner life leads to the illumination of the "family of prophets."

Man has the right of knowing whom he serves, else were his service idle. As Dr. Holmes has sung it:

Sun of our life, thy quickening ray
Sheds on our path the glow of day;
Star of our hope, thy softened light
Cheers the long watches of the night."

NATURE'S TEMPLE.

View of the Two Sides of Infinity.

The minimum and maximum sides of nature, as revealed by the telescope and microscope, have opened the sacred portals of the temple of fact to science. The telescope shows the sublime immensity of space occupied by unnumbered constellations of solar systems, shining in their distant homes like flowers of beauty. The awe-inspiring spectacle of this sidereal galaxy brought to view, and enhanced by the greatness in volume, and velocity in momentum possessed by these celestial organisms, convey a faint and inadequate idea of the maximum side of infinity.

When the powerful lens has penetrated the veil of space beyond the many bright constellations invisible to the unaided eye, it finds still on shining clusters in the seeming void of immensity. Well did the genius of a Pascal exclaim, "The universe has its center everywhere, and its circumference nowhere."

In the infinite temple of nature there is no night of dark vacuum, but the beautiful lights of life and activity are ever shining in the back-ground of spacial infinity.

On the other hand the microscope comes to our aid and informs us that the infinitude of mass and extension revealed by the greater lens is but one side of infinity, for these huge bodies, numbered in millions, are but the aggregated products of the infinitely small, and that the illimitable multiplication of point centers, and if one atom of the universal mass in matter, or one point center in space were with-drawn, infinity would be lost in its completion.

The microscope reveals the infinite minuteness of the atom, and the spark of energy animating it. It shows us that all the great bodies of space are built of these infinitesimal atoms, and that the spark of energy correlating the atom fills all avenues of the atom compounds, as air, water, and land surface with animalcular life forms. These organisms are perfect in form, possessing nutritive and reproductive functions, and so minute that millions exist in a drop of water, and billions in a cubic inch of air. They run in groups, and species, and affinitize in this manner. They seem to be the foundation stones of organic life, in the same way that the atoms are of planetary bodies. These animalcules affinitize in species to form organic species, and according to grade they construct the many species of the biological ladder, in this way each species is the organized form of the chemical aggregate of his own microbe, and this would account for atavism, and reversion in organic evolution, also for amalgamations in vegetable and animal biology. An individual of any species is a form of microbe structure, the microbe determines his species, form structure, functions and psychic powers.

As an atom is a small sphere, like its aggregated planet mass—bi-polar as a basis for chemical action, why may not the microbe of each species be of the form of its aggregated mass in species form? For instance the dog microbe is of the dog form, and the human, the human form. A microbe is a life-form—a biological unit of species, as the atom is a chemical unit of planet. These life units affinitize in organic mass, and densely populate the blood; they construct the cell, carry on waste and repair, and they exclude the hostile and destructive microbes of disease. These microbes have their respective taste in respect of food and drink; they are industrial or indolent, carnivorous or herbivorous, and when they contract a taste for alcohol or opium they persist in spite of censure from their rulers. These builders lay out in form the mighty oak in the acorn ere they construct. They plan the future man in the spermatozoa ere they construct him in embryo. When they have filled their place in nature as organic builders, their aural units are assimilated to the psychic forces of their respective species and individuals, for they find a happy resurrection in the aural psychic, adding thereto their potentialized experiences—and their aggregated aural mass forms the "human psychic ego" into one unified personality, indivisible, immortal and progressive.

These life units when organized into an affinitized mass of individuality, become a great nation, with allotted functions and departments. They build the bones, muscular and nerve structures—but when they are low in grade they construct as inarticulates, and as they progress in intelligence they build more wisely in the vertebrates. Then in greater endowment they give us our masters in arts, philosophy and science, yet in bad condtions they often give us deformities in the organic and psychic planes. They become erudite as a philosopher, and polished in the urbanity of a gentleman.

This life unit is the product of correlated energy of the atom, and he that would find God must look into this small spark of life, and its counterpart, the atoms. The world of matter is from atoms. The world of life is from its correlating energy, and these two in unity of action form universal nature. The pantheism of science, and philosophy. The infinity of God is in the atom and its animating energy.

YOUR FUTURE LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

LETTER NUMBER TWELVE.

Father Ambrose answered not a word to this, but sat staring directly into my eyes. A troubled look passed like a wave over his countenance and I followed up my advantage,

"Do you not wish to be happy yourself?" I asked.

"How do you know that I am not supremely happy?" he queried.

"I know that you are not, and cannot be," I replied. "No one can be happy here unless one is following out the law of progression. What progress can you possibly make, shut up here with a lot of vassals cringing about you, simply looking at those pictures which represent no truth whatever?"

"No truth?" almost wailed the priest. "No truth, do you say? Then, in God's name, what is true?"

"Come out of your shell and I will show you."

Father Ambrose covered his face with his hands, his chest heaved as with a sob, then he suddenly spread his hands out before me somewhat entreatingly. "I have a mind," he said, in a choked voice, "to make a confidant of you. I have never opened my soul to any living creature before, and there is no one here to whom I could. Not one of these people, by whom I am surrounded, could give me the slightest information concerning anything, even if I begged or prayed for it. Sir, before I passed out of the material, deeply hidden within the innermost recesses of my being was the thought that there was, really, no existence after the death of the material body. So, what mattered it to me, or what difference did it make what the people believed? I thought they were better men and women in consequence of the restrictions of the Catholic church; but now that I find I and the rest of humanity really do live after the death of the material body, I am somewhat at a loss what to do, and naturally fell into my former position."

"What you tell me, sir, is nothing more than I have known all along. That which you supposed hidden is not hidden at all, as you will discover as soon as you set yourself free. You are in worse bondage, even, than your people."

"You have known it all along?" he questioned. "How is that, sir?"

"Not I alone, but all the universe of spirits and angels above you. Those beneath you, I admit, do not know it; but all who are above you do; they all know that you are deceiving these people, that you are lying to them; they all know that you have not seen God; they all know that this is not purgatory; they all know that no hell lower than the one you are holding these people in exists for them or in fact for you. Do you realize, sir, that you have created a hell about you and that you are master of it? It sounds odd, I know, to say that you are the devil in person, holding your subjects in hell, but such is really the case, and there are thousands of just such devils and as many hells. All men who hold other men and women in bondage are devils, and their slaves are in hell. You are not a holy man of God, but one of many devils."

"Now, as I said before, I have been sent here to you. Not by a personal God, for such a being I have never seen, but by a band of angel messengers, to which band I belong, to lead you forth out of this bondage into the light, in other words to reform you, and when you are free, I desire that you will assist me to free these your slaves."

"If I listen to you," asked the priest, "what am I to receive in return? If I throw myself out of my present position, tell these people that I am a fraud and have deceived them, they will fall upon me and rend me; horrible disorder will prevail, and although they cannot kill me, still you can readily see that they can torture me—can wreak their vengeance on me in a thousand different ways"—and Father Ambrose shuddered at the thought.

"Yes; they can do all that you say. See what a hell you have been creating for yourself as well as for them."

The priest's eyes now looked pleadingly into mine, and he stretched forth his hands imploringly.

"Ah, I must keep on," he said, in a low, hesitating voice. "It is better for all concerned."

"It is not better," I expostulated. "You simply postpone the time, that is all. It must come sooner or later."

"But the promised day of judgment might be, to them, a very remote, far-off period."

"No," I said; "for some are sure to discover that you have been deceiving them, and as a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump, so you will have these people down upon you before you think. It is liable to occur at almost any time. You had better take the bull by the horns at once. By doing so you may entirely avert the calamity. Ambrose," I continued, drawing my chair nearer to him, "I will be your friend and help you, and together we will make a heaven of this place instead of a hell. When the next time comes that you were to address the people, I will stand in your place; in the meantime you may remain in retirement, and not until all danger is past shall you stand before them."

"Very well," said he. "It shall be as you say; but as you tell them the truth, I fear the establishment will tremble and fall in ruins about our heads."

"No, it shall not," I replied. "I will break the truth to them so gently, and by such slow degrees, that it shall simply change gradually into a splendid establishment, wherein are many temples of wisdom for the promulgation of truth," and thus it was arranged.

Although there is no time in the spirit world, still spiritual beings can portion time out, if they so desire, according to former habits.

Ambrose had done this and his people were all living in accordance with earthly time, and according to their time to-morrow would be Sunday. Although the spirit world is never dark, yet spirits can darken their homes artificially if they wish; and this also Ambrose had ordered to be done and it was now their evening of Saturday; the next day, their Sunday, I was to take Ambrose's place.

He invited me to sup with him and remain over night, which I very willingly did. The priest ordered a light repast, and as we sat at table we became fast friends instead of bitter enemies. The priest really had very many fine qualities of mind and heart.

"Mr. Denton," he said, as we sat at table partaking daintily of bread, cake and fruit, together with unfermented grape juice, which we sipped with pleasure, "I wish you would tell me more about this life—this eternal life of the spirit. I thought to be dead, but I find myself alive. Of course, it pleases me better to live than to die; but eternal life sounds dizzy and awful to me. You really think there will be no end to life anywhere?"

"I am confident of it," I answered. "But we go along step by step, one degree after another, just as we did on earth. The more wisdom we have the happier we are, and as we gain wisdom errors drop away from us."

"And you think that we shall be able, gradually, to change these structures into temples of wisdom, and I shall not be thrown out, lonely and hopeless, to wander, whither I know not?"

"You shall not," I answered, "providing you assist me in the good work."

"I promise, then, to do all that you require; but I feel sadly in need of true wisdom myself. I really desire, more than I can express, to know more about this life that I have entered, so entirely unprepared."

"If you had prepared yourself before coming here, it would have been far better for you and for these people who now hang to your skirts."

"I begin to realize the truth of what you say, most deeply," and Ambrose sunk his face in his hands.

"But as you did not," I went on, "we will spend no time in vain and idle regrets, but commence at once to make amends for the wrongs and shortcomings of the earthly life."

"But, Mr. Denton, tell me more about your life here. What have you discovered or learned since you came here?"

"In order to tell you I shall have to commence at the base of things," I remarked. "We cannot rear a structure without a good foundation. If our foundation is untrue, or rotten at the core, our structure is very apt to fall in ruins about us. We ought not to build unless truth lies firm at the foundation."

"I think I understand," he said.

"Yes," I replied. "Your old structure must all come down, for falsehood and not truth is at the bottom."

"But there must be some truth in all that I have believed in the past?"

"You tell me that you did not believe the things that you taught—if you believed that death ended all of course—as you now find that you were entirely wrong."

"Well," he said, hesitatingly, "I sometimes doubted if I were right. I really wavered between fear and doubt. Oh, I believe I am all wrong," and he sighed deeply.

"You certainly are," I said emphatically. "As a young man your life was dedicated to the priesthood?"

"Yes."

"I fear so," with another deep sigh.

"If you had dedicated your life toward the pursuit of truth, wherever it might be found, you would have started right. Your next step was a vow of eternal celibacy. This was an error black as night. You could not have wronged yourself more deeply, or flown in the face of natural law more defiantly, for marriage is the firm, true base of all existing things, no matter what they may be."

"You swore eternal celibacy," I continued. "Have you kept your vow?"

"I have never married," he said, rather defiantly.

"You mean that you have not been united to one and only one, but have united yourself to as many as it pleased your convenience or fancy?" Ambrose flushed scarlet. "It is useless to deny my accusation, for it is well known to every spirit and angel above you. Shall I tell you more?"

"Go on! Go on!" he wailed.

"You say you did not wed, but I am prepared to fetch hither at least fifty children that are here in the spirit world whose sire you are, and there are a goodly number still on earth. What kind of a foundation in truth is this for a structure to rest upon? for what you have done nearly every other Catholic priest in the earthly world has done. Is this hypocritical falsehood or not? Remember, if you say it is not, then will I bring your spirit children into your presence. You find, sir, that as you live all live whom you have brought into existence."

The priest shook as with an ague-fit. "Natural law would have wedded you to one and one only, and if purity and truth abided with you, you might, probably, have been the honored father of a half-dozen children or so, whom you would have loved and who would have loved and respected you. Now I have another question to ask: How does it happen that these fifty souls, more or less, are here in the spiritual world, some of them having been here, at least, forty years? You were over sixty when you arrived and you have been sending these immortal beings here since you were twenty-five years of age. They are all here, sir, every one. I have only to call and they will all come and meet you face to face."

"Oh, my God! Great God!" groaned the priest.

"Will you answer me, sir? How did your children, so many of them, happen to come to this world—little, broken, helpless creatures—many of them not a span long? How did they come here, sir, how did they come here?"

The priest threw himself headlong upon the floor, writhing in agony.

"Father Ambrose, as you were called on earth, when I first entered here you called me many names if I remember right?: an impious blasphemer, lying wretch, flying in the face of Almighty God. You did not call me a murderer. No; I never murdered a human being, never murdered so much as one of my own children or caused them to be murdered. How about you, sir? Get up, Ambrose, get up. Sit in your chair and face the truth as best you can; groveling won't help matters any;" but I was obliged to go to his assistance. I lifted him from the floor and placed him in his chair. He buried his face in his arms upon the table.

"If you did not murder these children, personally," I went on, "you know that they were to be murdered—you aided and abetted it—was accessory to the crimes committed. You, knowingly, brought these little creatures into existence, well aware, at the time, that they must and would be murdered. Many of them, I admit, were never born, but all that passed a certain period of gestation are here to meet their most unnatural and murderous father. Holy Father art thou indeed! And the mothers of these former babes—for most of them are now grown out of infancy, they range all the way from men and women to small children—where are the mothers? Many of them you, no doubt, have forgotten, so I will answer for you. Some of them are here in the spirit world; some are on earth in the material form, many of these being nuns—holy virgins whose lives were dedicated to perpetual virginity and chastity—brides of heaven—God's brides! Oh, what blasphemy! They, poor brides, took the veil and in their unsophisticated innocence believed all that was told them, their first false step being the most unnatural one of perpetual virginity. No woman was ever intended by nature to be a perpetual virgin. Nature intended that when the rose blushed love and marriage should follow thereafter. Poor, innocent girls! Through the false teachings of such as you they thought to cheat nature of her dues. Alas—alas! Shut away from the world they soon discovered their awful mistake; they were not the brides of heaven, as they supposed, but the puppets and playthings of the priests; and woe, woe to the maid who refused. Shall I bring one or two before you? They are ready to face you now: One who on your account was confined in a dark cell for months on bread and water, then, at last, brought forth a mere skeleton, with scarce the breath of life within her and what little she had smothered out of her by the aid of a feather bed. She is here, Ambrose, ready to meet you. No, priests do not wed! There were others who rather than endure such horrors, finding themselves entirely helpless, quietly yielded to their fate and did the best they could. When the time came that their little innocent babes must be murdered, they wrung their hands in agony, and instead of being brides of heaven, they became helpless murderesses, the most of them being compelled to murder or strangle their own little babes with their own hands, and those who were not able to do this, were obliged to witness the act as it was performed by others. Oh, these heavenly brides! Poor, innocent victims! What an awful hell—what a burning hell of torment did you and those like you, plunge these innocent ones into; but their souls are pure and white compared to yours; there was no escape for them, but you might have set yourself free—you might have really led a celibate life and not have been the means of plunging innocent ones into this terrible hell.

"Ambrose, wake up and look it all in the face. Lift up your head. The day of judgment is now upon you according to the deeds done in the body. The recording angel, or the record of the immortal soul is like a scroll now unrolling before you."

"But there is no hell!" almost shouted Ambrose, raising his head defiantly. "You, yourself, say there is no hell. To tell people there was no hell was the greater part of your business on earth, and if there is no hell, what have I to fear? A day of judgment is not needed. I shall now echo your cry, 'There is no hell—there is no hell!'"

"But I never said, when on earth, that strict justice was not, at last, meted to all; for I believed that the great eternal law of justice would at length prevail. I believed it then, I know it now. Ambrose, for every wrong act you ever committed you will be obliged to make strict restitution even to the fineness of a hair, even to the last farthing, and there is no escape for you. Turn whichever way you will it will meet you at all points and everywhere; consequently, I beg of you, turn, as quickly as possible, from the wrong that you are now committing, and begin to make amends for the wrong already done. There are greater wrongs carried on here, now, within this institution than merely deceiving the people who make up your following."

"What do you mean?" he thundered, and then turning his face from me he groaned: "Oh, I am lost—I am lost!"

"You have a nunnery here, filled with victims—victims to your lust—they are shut away from the light of heaven; they weep and wail and gnash their teeth; they know not how to escape; they have been taught to believe all that you tell them since early childhood; they have not dared to think for themselves. You found some of these poor, shivering, panic-stricken creatures here when you came; they had been confined within nunneries so long on earth they knew not what to do; they had been brides of heaven so long they knew nothing better than to be the same here; and so they clung to you. To cling to their priestly masters was all the knowledge they possessed. What could be expected of them? They had done nothing since early youth but cross themselves, mumble prayers, count their beads, and await the visits of the holy fathers, their masters; poor, wretched slaves, who never went outside the walls of the convent, scarcely outside their cells during a life-time on earth. Poor, wretched prisoners, worse, a thousand times worse than slaves; and, base wretch that you are, you never relented, and when once their spirits were broken the monotony of their lives became so horrible and unbearable that your base visits became a joy to them, and so they kissed your cruel hands like dogs, and clung to you and wept. After a little they were shaken off like dogs and beaten, starved, and cursed—poor brides of heaven! Now you have many of these poor victims within this structure; you still continue your vile practices; they, poor creatures gave up all hope of heaven long years ago on earth; they knew nothing but to be your slaves; they had been hidden so long away from all human companionship and human sympathy, like poor, stricken animals, they sought a hiding place still; and you, to cover your former sins, that you might still continue to deceive the people, fearful that they might publish their great wrongs to ears that might listen, have them concealed within this structure, still perpetuating your crimes, all but murder. They do not bear you children now, so you are all saved from that awful crime, but your soul is just as black; you would still continue to murder if you could; but life can no longer be taken; vice can still be continued for a season, but the day of reckoning is here. Ambrose, commence to pay what thou owest."

"Who and what am I to pay?" growled the priest.

"You are to pay your own soul, together with all whom you have wronged."

"What authority have you to command me?" he asked, surlily, bristling up once more.

"I belong to a band of angels and they have sent me here. I am their medium or mouthpiece, and angels, as you well know, are heavenly messengers; they are both wise and good; they bring light and joy into dark places; they open the gates of hell and let the captives go free. Now hell is ignorance, error and vice, and they counteract ignorance with wisdom, error with right, and vice with virtue. The soul rises into heaven through wisdom, love and truth—and heaven simply means happiness—or sinks into hell through ignorance, error and vice—and hell simply means unhappiness. Ambrose, if you want to be happy and make others happy, if you want to be in heaven and make heaven for these your victims and followers, listen to my voice; for I am one crying in the wilderness of error; repent ye, repent ye, and the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

"But if I will not repent," said Ambrose, sternly, "what then?"

"Then shall you be shaken like a reed in the wind, and this structure of falsehood, vice and error shall tumble about your ears. The light of truth shall be let in whether you will or no. Your followers shall desert you; they shall spit upon you; many of them will wreak their vengeance upon you; and you shall stand exposed to the gaze of the whole world, surrounded by your murdered children and the helpless victims of your lust, all of them clinging to the skirts of your priestly garments. Thus shall you be exposed to the gaze of the angelic hosts."

The priest trembled once more. "You promised me that you would aid me in giving light to these people, and I shall hold you to that promise. To-morrow is your Sunday—your holy day. Now this is what you are to do to aid me: The closed doors of that nunnery must be opened; those trembling victims set free; they are to join the others in listening to my discourse, and they are never more to remain in hiding. Poor trembling slaves! The light of wisdom must gradually break in upon them. Will you open the doors yourself, or shall I break them open?"

"You dare not break them," he said, doggedly. "Why, my people will all, with one accord, fall upon you and fling you headlong from our gates."

"And as they fling me, I shall be flung into the midst of a great army of bright ones, who will immediately demolish your structures and leave you all exposed to the view of the just."

"It will be much the best way," I replied. "And now, Ambrose, I wish to tell you something of earth. The word has gone forth, which means that the angelic hosts are determined to abolish the nunneries of earth. The angels or spirits of just men and women will control or influence the earthly world to that degree, that the prison doors of the nunneries shall be opened, all cells and underground apartments shall be inspected. No nun or woman shall be confined against her will. She shall not be confined even if she desires it. There shall be no barred windows, and all doors to all cells shall be removed. There shall be no fastenings to any door or window except such as are used in all ordinary houses and homes. No vows of perpetual celibacy shall hold good, and it shall be considered a crime to make such vows, a crime against the marriage laws of the world, as it has always been against natural laws. It shall not be considered a crime for any priest to wed, and if he has made such a vow it shall, in the law, be considered null and void. Now, Ambrose, this shall shortly come to pass on earth. The word has gone forth: Let my people go free; and, as it was with the black captive, so shall it be with the white nun whose awful fate is a thousand times more dreadful than was that of the black slave. Let my people go free. Freedom! Freedom for all. Good night, Ambrose. I see you have a number of couches here. I will take one until your morrow comes."

The priest turned away with a murmured good night. A misty curtain dropped between us and I rested for awhile as I hope he did. In my next letter I shall tell you about that morrow.

OUR PREMIUMS.

BEAR IN MIND.

Remember, please, that we send many of our Premium Books by express. If you do not receive your order promptly by mail, inquire at the express office. If not there, notify us at once.

Remember, please, that it costs ten cents to get a personal check cashed at a bank in Chicago. If you send a personal check, add ten cents to the amount sent.

Remember, please, that we have only two books which we send out now for 25 cents each. We cannot allow you to select any other book or books in their place.

Remember, please, that you are not entitled to purchase any of these Premium Books unless you send in with your order a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that the safest way to make a remittance is to secure a postal order.

Remember, please, that mistakes and trouble may be avoided by dealing direct with this office, instead of through a news agent.

Every person who sends in a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker can have until June 1, 1902, the two following books for 25 cents each: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science," by Hudson Tuttle, and "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." Both exceedingly valuable, and though widely different, each one fills on exceedingly important niche in the literature of Spiritualism. After June 1, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands" will no longer be sold for 25 cents.

If you order only one book, and that one neither of the books mentioned above, the price is 50 cents.

If you order two books, and neither of them the above mentioned, the price is 90 cents.

We have NINE Premium Books only, and you can select from them as follows:

Any three of the nine Premium Books you order, price $1.10.

Any four of the nine Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.

Any five of the nine Premium Books you may order, price $1.80.

Any six of the nine Premium Books you may order, price $2.10.

Any seven of the nine Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.

Any eight of the nine Premium Books you may order, price $2.50.

Lastly, all of these NINE valuable Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $2.75, a price never before equaled in this country or Europe. The following is the list:

NINE REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $2.75.

1—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 1.

"The Infidelity of Ecclesiasticism. A Menace to American Civilization." By Prof. W. M. Lockwood, lecturer upon physical, physiological and psychic science. Demonstrator of the molecular or spiritual hypothesis of nature. Scholarly, masterly, trenchant. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"Spiritual Fire Crackers, Bible Chestnuts and Political Pin Points." By J. S. Harrington. A pamphlet containing 70 pages of racy reading. Price 25 cents. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker.

"Rending the Vail." This volume is a compilation by J. W. Nixon, of psychic literature, most given by spirits through and by means of full form visible materializations, at seances of a certain Psychic Research Society, known as the Aber Intellectual Circle, the medium being William W. Aber. 507 pp. octavo. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price $2.

"The Spiritual Significance, or, Death as an Event in Life." By Lilian Whiting. One of Miss Whiting's most suggestive, intensely interesting, spiritual books. It is laden with rich, thoughtful spirituality. For sale at this office. Price $1.

THE GREAT QUESTION.

Ignorance or Education—Which?

The prospect of an educational institution controlled by Spiritualists seems to stir up not a little feeling of opposition to the same, and a persistent advocacy of ignorance as the true basis of genuine mediumship. As the first regular lecturer in the Spiritualistic field and a personal acquaintance of all the first workers, it has seemed to me that a plain statement of real facts might be appropriate to the present stage of the discussion.

I submit, in the first place, that the original lecturers were mostly persons of a fair amount of education. For myself, I had spent several years of hard study. Could read the Bible in Hebrew, Greek, Latin and English. Had studied History, sacred and profane. Was booked in Intellectual and Moral Philosophy as well as general literature, and never found that my education interfered in the least with any of the several phases of mediumship which I have possessed. S. B. Brittan was a well educated man. So also were Fishbough, T. L. Harris, R. P. Ambler, Adin Ballou, Simon Hewitt, R. P. Wilson and Selden J. Finney. All these men were ministers as well as Samuel Watson, and another distinguished Southern preacher whose name I do not recall. Hiram Snow, J. M. Spear and Uriah Clark may be added to the number. Also Lyman C. Howe, E. W. H. Toohey, Henry C. Wright, J. M. Peebles, Benj. Tod, H. B. Storer, W. F. Jamieson, Moses Hull, E. V. Wilson, Frank Wadsworth, Joel Tiffany, Judge Edmunds, and many others.

Among the lady speakers, Emma Jay, afterwards Bullene, was the first trance speaker in Boston and New York. Achsa Sprague soon followed. Then Mrs. Brigham, Mrs. Richmond, Mrs. Watson and others. Lizzie Doten was a poet and writer before she lectured on Spiritualism. Emma Hardinge was an educated Englishwoman, fitted for the stage, and a music teacher before becoming a medium and lecturer.

Now about the uneducated. Mrs. Watson and Mrs. Richmond are held up as the luminous examples of persons educated by the spirits. Without controverting the assumption of spirit assistance, it is enough to say that both these ladies are instances of exceptional natural capacity; and also that they both possessed fine opportunities for learning in their early mediumship, which they well improved. Both of them had also had some opportunities for ordinary schooling.

One thing may be set down as an axiom: the spirit world will not do for us what we can do for ourselves. It would be a curse if it did.

So far as the great whole of education is involved, spirit persons cannot educate us if they would, and nothing is more detrimental to human progress than the superstitious reliance upon the invisible for help to do what belongs exclusively to ourselves. That ignorant trust is the tremendous incubus which retards the progress of our movement. The paralysis of the Spiritualist cause can be traced directly back to the substitution of spirit control and test performances on the platform, for the scientific and philosophic lectures of the able thinkers and scholars of the early years. Ignorance has been at a premium, and culture and scholarship at a discount on the Spiritualist platform.

In the enumeration, I omitted mention of A. J. Davis, intentionally, as he is thrust in our faces as the one illustrious example of ignorance instructed by spirits. In the first place, I submit that there is but one A. J. Davis, and he is a sui generis, an exceptional man. Mr. Davis is now, and has been for years, an educated man. Again, he is not an ordinary medium. His experiences with spirit persons have been unlike those of any other medium. They have more nearly resembled those of Swedenborg than any other person; and Swedenborg and Galen were his primary teachers, and their teaching was usually only suggestions how he could solve problems himself, instead of solving them for him.

The first great work of Mr. Davis was entitled "Nature's Divine Revelations, and a Voice to Mankind. By A. J. Davis, the Clairvoyant." This book was given in a series of lectures while he was in a mesmeric trance, and taken down and edited by Rev. Wm. Fishbough. During the delivery of these lectures, Mr. Davis was in the society of educated persons. Brittan, Harris, Fishbough, Dr. Lyon (his mesmeriser), Katie, his first wife, and many others. A paper was started called the Univercoelum, with which he was connected. In the meantime, he had evolved from the negative, mesmeric condition into the "Superior Condition." By autosuggestion he could at once become clairvoyant, psychometric or telepathic without losing his normal consciousness.

"The Great Harmonia," of many volumes, is the product of that "Superior Condition." Hence, A. J. Davis has not been a tool—"an instrument," used by a so-called "control" to give somebody's thoughts to the world, but an independent man learning from all sources, and especially from Nature; hence, he was named the "Apostle of Nature." Prior to the rappings, he had made much progress in education. As I said above, there is but one A. J. Davis, and his attributes and culture are unique and furnish no example for any one else, as his mediumship, if you call it so, bears no resemblance to that of others, and certainly affords no sort of justification or apology for ignorance.

Having disposed of the question of persons being educated by spirits, the next thing to settle is whether it is necessary for Spiritualists to have any special education above or beyond what is furnished by our existing institutions. After admitting, what is generally conceded, that is, that our present system is not perfect, we can see nothing requisite for Spiritualists which is not needed by others as well. Hence, Spiritualists, as members of the body politic, should work for general improvement instead of setting up another system of sectarian schools. Our common school system, though defective, does substantial justice to all, for no system of religion can there be taught. Do we desire to force Spiritualism there? I think not.

But we want to educate our teachers, it is claimed. We don't need schools to teach logic, rhetoric, grammar, philosophy, history, etc., etc., for they are all taught in our present institutions as well, or better than we can do it at present. What then do you want to specially teach? I suppose the answer must be this: We propose to teach Spiritualism, including especially mediumship. Now here is where the real difficulty meets us squarely in the face. What is Spiritualism? Who has any authority to answer? Where is the authoritative definition? Shall we take the Banner of Light, The Light of Truth or The Progressive Thinker as the authorized definer. These expounders by no means agree. Very much which appears in The Progressive Thinker, even in its editorial columns, would not be admitted in the Light of Truth. Shall we take the definitions and methods of Moses Hull, the president of the Pratt Institute and have our future lecturers drilled in the literature and interpretation of that bundle of myths and fables called Holy Scripture and taught how to defend natural Spiritualism by quoting the affirmed miracles of exploded fables? Again, are we to have our Institute opened with daily prayers and invocations to some man-made God? Is our Institute to be a religious institution in the ordinary sense of that term? Are the pupils expected to subscribe to the creed of the N. S. A. and worship its Infinite Intelligence? It would seem so from the fact that the N. S. A. is fathering the enterprise. Until these points are settled no rationalistic Spiritualist can intelligently endorse the proposed departure. That there is a clique in the Spiritualist movement longing to affiliate with the old church by adopting the most essential portion of its creed and aping its senseless ceremonies or ordination, prayer, baby sprinkling, railroad rebates, etc., etc., there can be no question. That the final result will be a sect assuming special sanctity and denouncing the rationalistic Spiritualists as atheists and infidels. Godism, Bigotry and Persecution never have been dissipated. They are an inseparable trinity, no matter what the banner may be which they carry.

The Christian clergy has always been a learned body of men, and it is thought that Spiritualist Reverends should also be learned, especially learned as to the doctrines they are to teach. And yet Buckle declares of the clergy that the more they learn the more ignorant they become; and if we pursue an analogous course we may reap the same harvest. A learned ignoramus is a most undurable character.

But the grand reason why Spiritualists should not establish colleges and universities, is because they are anti-democratic. They are the product of aristocracy. They were not intended for the people. They retain, even now, more or less of their ancient barbarism. They are anti-democratic in that they are sustained by endowments. That means interest bearing bonds, and that means that the people are taxed by indirection to sustain the higher institutions, which the millionaires are supposed to do. Only the common schools are democratic. To perpetuate endowments is to perpetuate aristocracy. It is to subjugate the people to creeds, despotism and poverty. Spiritualism has no affinity for such a method, and all the efforts to endow institutes or homes is a stab at the very life of real Spiritualism. It is a pitiable aping of the contemptible charity of a false religion. It is a cringing fawning to be patted on the back and considered as "one of the denominations." It is prostituting Spiritualism to build up the very system it came to destroy.

"Ignorance is the mother of devotion," is really the cardinal doctrine of Christianity. Kingly despotism and church domination are its support. External poverty is its prophecy, and charity its crowning virtue and practice. Poor farms, poor houses and homes for the indigent are ulcerous cancers, showing the rottenness of the spiritual? doctrine and the governmental justice created by the Christian religion. The endowed colleges and universities are intended to educate priests and lawyers to eulogise the system and make laws to sustain and support them, and keep the people as ignorant as possible. Your charitable institutions are plasters to hide and soothe, not to cure the sore—anodynes to relieve the agony, not to destroy the cause! And modern Spiritualism, which came proclaiming destruction to this whole system of superstition and hypocrisy, is now being used to build up what it came to tear down. To eulogise as wise and religious what it unsparingly denounced and condemned!

So-called Spiritualists have ceased fighting causes and are busying themselves with the effects—with the excrescent branches, not the supporting roots. Let us have education, not the sham of mastering a theory. Let us have science, not an exposition of antiquated fables. Let us have a Democracy, not a Reverend Oligarchy.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

A VIEW OF THE OCCULT IN THEOSOPHY.

What lies beyond the grave?

Is there a realm somewhere beyond the blue ether in which lives are relived in perfect harmony with all natural laws?

Is there a divine affinity in the deep unknown governing the destiny of each temporal creature?

Is it possible for man to clear the bounds of mortality and see that which lies behind the veil?

Yes!

So claim the students of theosophy—these people who assume a distinct personality—half mortal, half spiritual—to whom 1,000 years is but a day.

Under the spiritual guidance of Hillerton, Morya and Koothumi these disciples from all parts of the United States meet in convention to-day in Indianapolis.

The object of the conference is to discuss plans for the broadening of the doctrine, to instill into each member more deeply the integral principles of soul reincarnation, and to further the general knowledge of that beautiful yet mysterious theory—the astral plane.

The Theosophist lives forever; according to his belief his soul is not only immortal, but he lives in the flesh numerous distinct and separate lives. All this time he is influenced by the three spirits already mentioned.

The esoteric presence of these divinities is alone felt by those who have advanced to a certain degree into the studies of the science. The others know or are taught of their existence, but never see them.

To the uninitiated this is the great fable of the Theosophists. Why they should claim divinities in the flesh and then fail to produce them to substantiate their theories and arguments is a question which has never been answered.

But the astral plane!

The Theosophists claim to be able to translate themselves, not in the body, but in the soul or mind, from this earthly sphere to that semi-spiritual conjuncture known as the astral state.

There they see and learn what was and is and will be.

Wherein they have formerly erred is made plain; their future life is outlined.

What a boon this would be to the ordinary individual. Under this regime man would need but to follow directions—no worry and bother for him. There would be no necessity for a chief executive, a national armament, schools, manufactories, inventions and art. Everything would be architecturally perfected and planned

But how slow!

According to the Theosophist man must advance by degrees and not spontaneously, as might be supposed. This takes several millions of years.

In the astral state the ideal is the real. The secrets of nature are no longer unsolved; there is no such thing as altruism; love is the universal keynote.

A contemporaneous romancer writes of this delightful sphere. By the teachings of the science he became an adept in the art of clairvoyance. Time and space were presumably eliminated. He fell asleep and, according to his narrative, his soul winged its flight heavenward. Planet after planet sped past. Worlds and their complements appeared and faded in the distance. In a burst of song and light he passed from the material into the astral. On a planet, fair as Elysian fields, a creature fair beyond description received him—his affinity.

"In my heaven-uplifted dream, while in the arms of an angel, I thought I saw a circular spacious garden in which all the lovely landscapes of a superior world appeared to form themselves by swift degrees. The longer I looked at it, the more beautiful it became, and a little star shone above it like a sun. Trees and flowers sprang up under my gaze, and all stretched themselves toward me, as though for protection. Birds flew about and sang; some of them tried to get as near as possible to the little sun they saw; and other living creatures began to move about in the shadows of the groves, and on the fresh green grass. All the wonderful workings of nature, as known to us in the world, took place over again in this garden, and I watched everything with a certain satisfaction and delight. I looked and trembled. My heart falls me now as I try to write of that tremendous, that sublime scene—the Center of the Universe—the Cause of all Creation. How unlike heaven such as we in our ignorance have tried to depict! though it is far better we should have a mistaken idea than none at all. What I beheld was a circle, so huge that no mortal measurements could compass it—a wide ring composed of seven colors, rainbow-like, but flashing with perpetual motion and brilliancy, as though a thousand million suns were forever being woven into it to feed its transcendent luster. From every part of this ring darted long, broad shafts of light, some of which stretched out so far that I could not see where they ended; sometimes a bubbling shower of lightning sparks would be flung out on the pure ether, and this would instantly form into circles, some very great, and whirl round and round in a luminous girdle of flame from which they had been cast, with the most inconceivable rapidity. But wonderful as the ring was, it encompassed a sphere yet more marvelous and dazzling; a great globe of opal-tinted light, revolving as it were upon its own axis, and ever surrounded by that scintillating, jewel-like wreath of electricity, whose only motion was to shine and burn within itself forever. I could not bear to look upon the brightness of that magnificent central world—so large that multiplying the size of the sun by a hundred thousand millions, no adequate idea could be formed of its vast proportions. And ever it revolved—and ever the rainbow ring around it glittered and cast forth those other rings which I know now were living solar systems cast forth from that electric band as a volcano casts forth fire and lava."

This is the astral sphere.

In this spiritual paradise the Theosophist, in a subjective sense, reviews his existence, delves into the histories of forgotten nations, communes with the spirits of the makers of history, and otherwise studies the aim and end of creation.

To the casual philosopher the question arises, "What does it all mean?"

Altogether distinct from the province of occult phenomena, such as hypnotism or telepathy, theosophy stands as one of the deepest science-religions in the world.

The ancient cults of the Hindoo priests are no longer mysteries to theosophy; the philosophies of Plato, Socrates, Isis and Osiris of the Nile, Questral of the Aztecs, the barbarous South African medicine men, the pabas of South America, in fact, all religions, ancient and modern, are more or less embraced. "Divine wisdom," as considered by its proselytes, is the universal religion.

The Theosophists do not make a practice of their occult powers. In that respect their religion assumes less of charlatanism than would otherwise be expected.

The astral plane, which is claimed to be real, is the greatest and most mysterious theme.

Can man visit this Eden? Is it possible for him to overcome all things material and revel in that which is secret?

"The astral plane is not the spirit plane. It is the middle plane, the 'midway plaisance' of our system. All Egoes pass through it again and again. The astral plane is real. It has all the forms and qualities of the earth. There all forms are met, all races, animals and plants and all mineral forms. It would be interesting, if profitable, to describe its minerals, its flora and fauna. All conditions there are intense.

"Everything appears in intense colors. The flowers are so much more highly tinted that they at first dazzle and confound the viewer. Sounds are intense and confusing, amounting to a jargon. The visitor is dazzled and confused. He sees the vast floral fields spread out with the wondrous tints, fruits and perfumes, and under each plant the serpent or spider; from all the bending trees are hanging trailing vines and writhing snakes; reptiles crawl; the air is filled with swarming larva; tigers lie in wait for their prey; fleeing animals rush through the jungles pursued by enemies; volcanoes belch lava forth; earthquakes shake the continents; lurid fires sweep and cyclones move in irresistible course through the forests, laying waste the trees, cities and navies, and the roaring of wild beasts, the cries of pain and fear, the shoutings of the multitude, chatter of apes, calls for help and the wailings of the insane, makes the wise and level-headed slow to rush into this state of consciousness.

"The possibility of visiting this plane has been shown; but it is not favored. It is dangerous in many ways and but little possible good is reached by going there. Even the expert had best keep away and the unlearned are always harmed by going.

"There are a host of schools of black magic now doing harm and one work of theosophy is to counteract the evils thereof. All the intricacies of hypnotism and mesmerism are explained in the school for that purpose; but theosophy is not a wonder-working system.

"Magic of the higher order will come to all in due time. The majestic powers of the 'master' to put on the physical body or to take it off, to travel in the 'mayavic' body, to appear at distant places, to see and hear at distances immeasurable, to transfer thoughts and to control the forces of nature and to perform wonders, will come to all. But these powers in the hands of selfish persons would do harm untold. It is the purpose of theosophy to take magic out of the hands of black magicians and transfer it only to those who are safely trusted with it. 'Adeptship' will come to all away down in the evolution of the future.

"It will come as the harvest comes, when seed time is past.

"It will come as the fruits after trimming and training, as the flowers come after ages of selecting.

"It will come as all good things have come after working and waiting. In the meantime theosophy says 'make the world better, stay with it, master it, finish the work here before another realm is undertaken.'

"The Theosophical Society does not have any creed. It has for its main objects three propositions: First, the formation of a nucleus for universal brotherhood, without any distinctions of race, creed or sex whatever. Recognizing at the present time the impossibility of reaching a universal brotherhood; while men are so selfish, while they do not know each other, while they are cutting each others' throats. Every assertion that an universal brotherhood has been reached is false. It originates in the selfish brain of a black magician who has some scheme of devilment on tap. It is not difficult to find living examples of this kind, where the central figure stands, with one foot in the pit and the other on the necks of honest and misguided followers.

"But the show is soon over, the sham is soon exposed, the grab time ends, and then the world begins again to try to mend the wrongs done and to recover from the nightmare. Real theosophy never prostitutes philosophy to selfish ends.

"The nucleus can be formed in many places, and the great universal brotherhood will 'form itself' in the evolution of the future. The second object of the society is the study of religions, sciences and philosophies, and to demonstrate the importance thereof. Almost all our religions came that way, and the value of such study is manifest. The third object of the society is to study the secret laws of nature and the psychic properties latent in man. This is the door to real occult study, which is encouraged in favor of the few who are ready for it.

"But the mistake which the Spiritualists make of setting all people at work at the astral plane, without reference to fitness, is avoided. Before any Theosophist is permitted to enter this dangerous field he is required to go through a drill and preparation, and is put under the most solemn pledges to use the powers for good alone. And he is furnished books, teachers and all the equipments for occult study.

"The Theosophical Society is a band of students, each free to set the pace and run the race at his own gait. It would not be any better than any other creed or dogma if it put people into a straight-jacket. Yet it must not be forgotten that while the 'society' is a free plat. m, where everyone is at liberty to interpret nature and man as he pleases, that theosophy, the wisdom religion, is a complete system of fixed and eternal principles, the same yesterday and to-day and forever.

"These foundation principles are accessible to those who are willing to search for them. Among the great lodges and great teachers there is no differences. All differences in statement are by the uneducated. Ignorance of theosophy is all the cause of apparent contradictions.

"The rule by which to tell whether the teaching is accurate is to see if the teacher has a 'personal motive,' an 'ax to grind,' or 'wants fame, shekels, loaves or fishes.' Every teacher who is absolutely altruistic is as sure to teach true theosophy as a stone is to fall when free. It will be impossible to more than glance at a few of the true principles of theosophy in the space at command.

"Theosophy is the trinity of science, philosophy and religion. It was dominant once over the whole earth. On some of the planets it has not been disturbed; but on earth it has been torn to pieces by the selfishness of early races. Each race and religion has a part; none have the whole of it. It underlies all religions and sciences and philosophies. The work now is to restore it in its entirety to the world. Among its general foundations is the 'fatherhood of God,' the 'brotherhood of man,' the 'immortality of the soul,' the 'law of Karma,' the 'law of reincarnation,' the 'doctrine of cycles,' the 'septenary law of all planes and states of consciousness,' the 'eternal progression of the Ego.'

"As to religion, it teaches that all religions have their value and their uses. Theosophy would not destroy any religion, or burn any Bible, or persecute any communicant.

"All these are parts of the great system of evolution. Almost all the religions do good to the people who follow them, and theosophy, instead of destroying them, would encourage the communicant to live up closer to the spirit of the teaching. These creeds are not accidents; they are here by a law. Theosophy is friendly to all. It would suggest, however, to all to use creeds for a purpose and not let creeds use them, to try to progress, and when a creed has done its work and is not up-to-date and has lost its grip, to revise it, or drop it, for a better one. Theosophy would not take away from a cripple his crutches, but it might 'cure his lameness' and then suggest to him that 'for him the crutches were no longer necessary.' It does teach a supreme intelligence; yet it suggests that so far as we have gone in the line of development our conceptions of God are crude, and that as fast as we can improve our conceptions of the Father of all we are benefited.

"Theosophy is the handmaid of all efforts to do good. It teaches the three planes of existence, the physical, astral and spiritual. And here as much as anywhere it shows its superiority. All the wild and incoherent mistakes of some spiritualists are corrected.

"Theosophy uses only sensible methods, undertakes only possible things, adopts only high-toned plans, favors only unselfish theories. It looks too far ahead to expect immediate results. It strikes at the 'causes of evil.' It recognizes that the 'patching' process of this age is a failure. It is awake to the law periodically. It recognizes the 'time' element.

"It has learned to labor and wait. While it watched the systems form and fade, the suns shine and their light go out, the continents sink and rise again, civilizations come and go, races vanish, creeds crumble, thrones tumble, sceptres rust, and the earth carry round and round the sun its enterprises; while it has watched the great 'cosmic clock,' the zodiac, as the constellations march the pathway of the sky; yet theosophy is practical.

"It hears the groans of slave and oppressed one, the widow's moan, the orphan's cry, the 'call from Macedonia.' It feels the martyr's fire, the pain from thumbscrews, block, rack and guillotine, and feels for all the oppressed of all lands. It holds out the hand of friendship to every form of good. It hails every joy, welcomes every smile, and 'with malice toward none and with charity for all,' with a firm faith in nature, in God and man, and the ultimate triumph of right and truth, it hastens with willing feet, tender heart, clear head and growing soul to try to prepare the world for the higher civilization and happier ages of the future."

Dr. Davis makes the following argument:

"The question has often been asked me, Is all the spiritualistic phenomena real or assumed? I will frankly say that all the so-called manifestations are not real. Then why? Simply this: when a medium has lived a life of secretion and overcome the selfish nature that exists within each and everyone of us, he is then able, under the proper circumstances, to produce the genuine spiritual phenomena. No one must deceive himself into the belief that this phenomena can be produced under all conditions, for such is not the case. Therein lies the difficulty with many of the mediums of to-day. They knowing within themselves that they can produce under favorable circumstances things seemingly supernatural, think that they must in order to establish a reputation be able to get manifestations under all conditions, favorable or unfavorable. Now, that being an impossibility, they must resort to deception, and on the discovery of such deception they call down condemnation upon their heads, which is proper and just.

"We have honest and dishonest men in all the walks of life, and why is it impossible to produce an honest medium? Admitting that there is practiced fake Spiritualism, is it impossible to find one who is honest? Would we ever have had counterfeiters if we did not have some good money to pattern after? No! And, again, if there never existed true spiritualistic phenomena, what would the fake have to pattern after? I frankly admit that I cannot on all occasions produce and obtain the desired manifestations.

"To produce true phenomena it is not necessary to retire to some dark and secluded spot and surround yourself with mystery. Some manifestations are not convincing to the investigator and to expose such is not detrimental to the cause of Spiritualism, but materially assists mediums who are honest and true.

"How can anyone disprove the fact that spirits return to earth? We are taught that the spirit of man never dies, and that God is in all and through all and over all. Admitting this to be true, then is he not with the dead as well as the living? And adopting the principle of a dual personality existing in each and every one of us, then is it impossible for us to educate the subconscious faculties to the extent that they supersede the fact that we possess a body, soul and spirit, let us say that the body is the media of communication from the sun world to the storehouse of knowledge, or soul, and the spirit is the media of communication from the unseen world to the storehouse of knowledge or soul, then by overcoming self and selfish motives we are able to communicate one to the other spiritually with the living as well as with the so-called dead.

"These things are adopted as truths by the Psychic Research Society of London, England, as well as scientific men all over the world.

"Psychological experiments have done much toward proving the existence of dual personality in man, and it is also proved that the spirit can be seen thousands of miles away and ascertain knowledge which is reliable, and so proved that time and space can be obliterated after the objective reason has become inactive."—Indianapolis (Ind.) Sentinel.

THE MEANING OF DREAMS.

The Mysteries of Mind Wrapped in What We See When We Are Asleep.

In the study of psychology, now becoming a popular branch of science, the strange phenomena of dreams cannot be neglected. The man who can find a true scientific explanation of dreaming will go far toward solving the mystery of the mind.

Many persons are but little affected by dreams. In their sleep they become as nothing. While it lasts sleep is to them equivalent to death.

But for many others sleep is a second existence. They live double lives, and no night passes for them that is not filled with dreams, which, while they last, seem as real as the scenes, events and experiences of waking life.

If people who habitually dream during their sleep are as long lived as those whose sleep is dreamless—and I know of no evidence to the contrary—then we may see in that fact an indication of the comparative tirelessness of the brain, which does not call for such frequent and prolonged periods of rest as the muscles demand.

But the probability is that the time actually occupied by the brain in presenting the pictures of our dreams is very short. It is not busy with them all the night long, but only during brief moments, for it has often been proved that a long dream, apparently extending over many hours, may really last but a second or two. Dreams are of the pure essence of thought, which is free from the bondage of time.

But whether a dream actually occupies a second, a minute or a whole night, it is, for the mind of the dreamer, as real as any other mental experience. You read one of Poe's tales or poems and a series of images passes before your mind's eye.

Yet, although you are awake, these images are not more vivid, but rather less vivid, than those of a dream. Great dreamers, when they fall into slumber, enter the voiceless halls of a library whose shelves are crowded with books that no waking being ever opened, filled with fictions that no pen ever indited.

A wonderful thing it is that dreamland has what I can describe only as fixed and recognizable localities. As I write I recall the following story told me by an intimate friend:

"From as early a period as I can remember I have, in my dreams, been accustomed to revisit places and scenes which, in their ensemble, their totality of effect, have never been known to me in waking existence. They may be a combination of mental images, of recollections of things separately witnessed in real life, but, as presented to the dreaming brain, they appear unlike anything I have ever actually beheld.

"I recall in particular a vast and splendid city, situated in a great V-shaped valley, bordered with towering heights and having a broad river rolling swiftly past the edge of the town at the mouth of the valley. I have had many an interesting adventure there in my dreams, and many times have stood upon the heights above the city, thrilling at the hight of its interminable expanse of roofs and towers, and of the dark, rapidly-rushing stream that flows by it—but I am sure I never saw the place when awake. Yet I invariably recognize it in a dream, and am conscious, even while asleep, that it is a dream city.

"There are other localities that I frequently visit and always recognize in dreams, though unknown to be in actual life. Some of them are outdoor scenes, so beautiful that I always experience a sense of joy upon seeing them again; and some are peculiar, fantastical and fearful interiors of definite structure, with rooms, passages, stairways, dungeons, indescribable crypts and dens, filled with vague terrors, seldom varying their shapes. And when I enter them in a dream I frequently recall a previous visit, and sometimes take advantage of what was then learned to escape a lurking peril."

It is clear that such dream scenes may be based partly upon actual experiences and partly upon remembered mental impressions and pictures derived from reading works of imagination, all mingled together and combined in the brain of the dreamer, where they assume new forms like the colored patterns in a kaleidoscope.

On the other hand they may also be original creations of the imagination, produced during sleep, and in any event they are interesting phenomena to study because they throw light upon the fundamental question: "What is the nature of thought?"—Garrett P. Serviss in Pittsburg Gazette.

Appreciative Comment.

"When the Bible said 'He that believeth not shall be damned,' it lighted fires and caused thousands to be put to death. When it said 'Servants, be obedient to your masters,' it riveted the chains on millions of human beings. When it said 'Take a little wine for thy stomach's sake,' it filled thousands of drunkards' graves. When the Bible said women should keep silence in the churches, it degraded woman, and made her inferior to man in the eyes of the world. When it said 'Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live,' it put thousands of innocent people to death."

I often see articles both editorial and from your correspondents that I would like to see printed over again, because of their intrinsic merit, and here is one of them, which I copy from the excellent article by Wm. F. Hunt, in No. 649.

While I would not by harsh criticism on the superstitions and falsities embraced therein, wound the feelings of the thousands of the so-called Bible Spiritualists, who may be as sincerely honest as myself, I want to utter my solemn protest against introducing into our organization any of the tomfooleries in the way of priestly display at so-called "consecrations" in the old church, even if in so doing I have to antagonize "our Moses" whom we all love and revere. Let the trappings, tinselry and display of a superstitious age—including the "Reverend" business, be and continue a back number so far as Spiritualists are concerned, if we wish either our own self-respect or the permenent success of our great movement for the world's enlightenment, or the respect of Liberals, of all shades of opinion. IN THE OCCULT WORLD.

Helena Servant Girl Alarms Bereaved Family.

Is a certain young lady of Helena, Mont., possessed of the devil? Or is the case of the French maid who went insane and while in the mad-house talked Greek fluently, although before her incarceration she had never uttered a word in that language, to be paralleled? Or has she hypnotized and rendered herself unable to remove the mystic shackles which bind her both mentally and physically?

These questions are agitating a circle of no mean proportions in the eastern section of this city and apparently are unanswerable. Developments are being awaited with much interest, especially by the doctor who has charge of the young lady.

The young lady in question is a domestic in the employ of the doctor, and, as might be expected, is not noted for her penmanship. Yet her manifi runs to writing, and these epistles are penned in a bold, upright style, far more legible than she had heretofore exhibited.

The doctor resides within a few blocks of a family whose head recently died, and was buried in Forestvale cemetery, some four miles from the city. Shortly after the death of the husband, the wife's mother, who resides in San Francisco, came here to console her daughter in her bereavement. It appears that the mother is a Spiritualist, and one evening the subject was broached while the doctor and his wife were visiting the bereaved woman and her mother.

Thereupon a Spiritualistic seance was held and several messages from the dead man were alleged to have been received. This was the starting point of the mystery. The domestic also called at the house to notify the doctor that his presence was desired elsewhere. The girl became interested in the knockings on the table and finally announced in solemn tones that she had a message herself from the dead man.

Seizing a pencil and paper, she began writing out the communication which related purely to personal affairs and concluded with a peremptory command for the doctor and his wife as well as his own family to go to Forestville cemetery Thursday morning at daybreak, that he had some important business instructions to give in regard to his estate.

The listeners were seized with fear, but after talking the matter over, decided to obey the supposed command. Consequently the entire party started for the cemetery in carriages early Thursday morning, but arrived some fifteen or twenty minutes after daylight.

The instant the young lady in question emerged from the carriage, a twitching of the muscles of her shoulder was noticed, which increased as she approached the grave. Paper and pencil were provided and she began to write off the messages. The first one read:

"Why were you not here at daylight, as I requested?"

Before the members of the party had recovered their equilibrium, the girl again resumed her writing, and handed this question to the amazed spectators:

"Why did you not wear that white dress (calling the girl by name, although he was a perfect stranger to her)? You looked so pretty in that dress."

Again, after a brief silence, the young lady interpreted some instructions to the dead man's wife relating to their children's education, directing that they should be sent to the Catholic school, although both himself and wife were Protestants.

He then directed the disposition of some mining stocks and ordered the development of certain claims, and of these the girl was entirely ignorant, yet without the least hesitation she is reported to have spelled the names of the various mines correctly, and one of them was a Spanish compound word at that.

The wife here broke down and wept bitterly, explaining that the cause of delay was due to one of the babies being ill. The girl, who was by long odds the calmest one of the party, continued to write, the next message reading:

"——(mentioning the wife's name), why do you go out so much since my death?" (This was apparently on the wrong tack, however, as the widow had been down town only once or twice, and then on business.)

He next complained that his mother had not been notified of his death (which was not done because of her extreme age, fearing the shock would kill her). He commanded that she take the children and visit his mother, who resides in the East, and, incidentally, this will be done next week.

Cissing, he said that he was in purgatory, and asked them, as well as Father Day (a local priest), to pray fervently for him.

The girl here gave way to the great strain, and it became necessary to remove her to a hospital, where she has since been confined to her bed. The mania for writing is still present, however, and before the nurses were aware of the fact she had written several hundred words on the sheeting of the bed.

The pencil being taken away she would use her fingers in drawing imaginary lines upon the blankets. The doctor by whom she was employed cannot account for the girl's actions, yet he cannot disbelieve his eyes, and especially when he found a message on the bed sheeting thanking him and several other friends (all of whom were named) for the kindness shown his family, and signed by the dead man.

The wife has ordered the body placed in a receiving vault and will have it cremated, while her mother has avowed that she will not again practice Spiritualism, saying that while she had always believed that it was of divine origin, she is now convinced that the devil possesses a hand therein.

The strange action of the young lady is attested for by at least a dozen trustworthy persons residing in the immediate neighborhood, and to say that it has created a sensation is putting it mildly, indeed.

The outcome of the girl's illness is awaited with much interest. As soon as she is out of danger the wife will remove with her mother to San Francisco, and the family hopes to destroy the supposed evil designs by having the body cremated.—The Bulletin, San Francisco, Cal.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

Three Journeys Around the World
—OR—
Travels in the Pacific Islands,

New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, India, and other Oriental countries. By J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D. Ph. D. In this splendid large book Dr. Peebles has concentrated a vast amount of valuable information. It is exceedingly entertaining and readable, and Spiritualism as he found it everywhere in his travels receives due attention, making the book of special value and interest to Spiritualists. 454 large pages, finely bound, at the price of $1.50.

"THE DREAM CHILD,"

A Fascinating Romance of Two Worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price, cloth, 75 cents. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times.

THE DESCENT OF MAN.

By Charles Darwin. Cloth, gilt top, 75 cents. On its appearance it aroused at once a storm of mingled wrath, wonder and admiration. In elegance of style, charm of manner and deep knowledge of natural history, it stands almost without a rival among scientific works.

AFTER HER DEATH.

The Story of a Summer. By Lilian Whiting. Pervaded with pure and beautiful spirituality of thought. Instructive and helpful to all who love and seek the higher and finer ways of spiritual experience. Price, $1.00.

WOMAN: Four Centuries of Progress. A Lecture delivered at the Freethinker's International Congress, Chicago, Ill., October, 1893. By Susan H. Wixon. Price, 10c.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

Historical and critical review, with replies to an objection. By G. W. Brown, M. D. Price, 15c.

Practical Methods to Insure Success.

A valuable little work, full of practical instruction in matters pertaining to physical, mental and spiritual health. Worth many times its cost. Price 10 cents.

ASTRAL WORSHIP By J. H. Hill, M.D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

The Christ Question Settled.

Jesus, Man, Medium, Martyr. A symposium by W. E. Coleman, J. S. Loveland, Hudson Tuttle, Moses Hull, J. R. Buchanan, B. B. Hill, Rabbi I. M. Wise, Col. Ingersoll—and what the spirits say about it. By J. M. PEEBLES, M. D. Whether this book settles the question or not, it will be found eminently entertaining, and brings together a mass of evidence to establish the historical character of Jesus. A large volume. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crocker. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

MAHOMET His Birth, Character and Doctrine. By Edward Gibon. This is No. 6 of the Library of Liberal Classics. It is conceded to be historically correct, and so exact and perfect in every detail as to be practically beyond the reach of adverse criticism. This work will be found intensely interesting. Price, 25 cents.

Crimes of Preachers.

An interesting book along its line and useful to Spiritualists attacked by the clergy and their followers. Price 25 cents; for sale at this office.

By W. J. Colville. Reports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume. Price, $1.00.

A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

THE OTHER WORLD AND THIS.

A compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature. By Augusta W. Fletcher. M. D. In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well handled with conciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings. Price $1.50.

THE SOUL OF THINGS;

Or Psychometric Researches and Discoveries. By Wm. and Elizabeth M. F. Denton. A marvelous work. Though concise as a text book it is as fascinating as a work of fiction. The reader will be amazed to see the curious facts here combined in support of this power of the human mind, which will resolve a thousand doubts and difficulties, make geology plain as day, and throw light on all subjects now obscured by time. Price, $1.50. In three volumes, cloth bound, $1.50 each. Postage, 10c per copy.

The Crank—Spiritual and Otherwise.

The Grafton Herald on one occasion pictured the crank most beautifully in contrast with the mental mendicants who never had an original idea in their scant brains:

"Though born ahead of his time, his genius is recognized by the bold progressive spirits of his race; but the rabble cannot comprehend him, because he does not do as they have been taught to do, speak as they have been taught to speak, or think as they have been taught to think; and so they thrust out their tongues at him as he passes by, and cry, 'Cur-rank! Cur-rank! Cur-rank!'

"Christ was a crank in the eyes of his generation; so was Galileo, and Columbus, and Martin Luther, so was Fulton, the father of steamboating, and Morse the inventor of the telegraph, and Stevenson, who set the first locomotive running on the rails. Never came an apostle, preaching a new dispensation in theology, politics, sociology, science, art or literature that wasn't stigmatized as a crank by the poor little jabernowls of his time—the numskulls whose whole history is written when we say that they were born—that they ate, drank, slept, procreated their species, died and rotted back into the universe, without once doing, saying or thinking a thing that was calculated to lift them above the beasts.

"These creatures swarm everywhere. We find them in the press, the pulpit, on the forum, in all forms of business; but the last one of them moves in the groove into which he was born, is incapable of getting out of it, and is nothing more—nothing less than a sentient machine. If the world had depended on them for its progress it would be steeped in its primitive barbarism to-day, and if left to their care now would revert back to the savagery from which the cranks have elevated it. If they had been born savages, savages they would have remained. They would have lived in caves, run stark naked, feasted on raw flesh, and yelled 'cur-rank!' at the first man who built himself a house, or hid his bare pelt with a skin, or cooked his food, or flew in the face of any of their pet particular customs.

"The crank is the genius of his generation, whose intellect is more fine and far-reaching than that of his contemporaries. He is endowed with the power of tracing effect to cause, and in this he discerns a truth that is denied to the knowledge of all until he comes. He teaches it. In time it triumphs. But the teacher—what of him? Behold! Christ was crucified, and he is only one of many benefactors—cranks if you will have it so—who have suffered for mankind. Some were beheaded, some were burned at the stake; some were chained like wild beasts and thrown into prison. The benefactors—the cranks—of our time are knocked at by the vulgar herd—reviled, ridiculed and utterly put to shame by brainless beastlikeads who are so far beneath them

'As Apollyon in the fire
To Ithuriel of on the wing.'

"But, as the cranks of old are the idols of to-day, so the Herald predicts that the cranks of to-day will be the gods of generations yet unborn—predicts that when they are dead and dust their sepulchres will be as

—'Pilgrim shrines—
Shrines to no code or creed confined;
The Delphian vales—the Palestines—
The Meccas of the mind!'"

The Herald does not, however, analyze the various kind of cranks. It is an acknowledged fact that the crank—the scientific crank, is really the savior of the present day. He is adventuresome; he removes obstructions; he is far-reaching in his estimate of men and things, and advanced ideas flicker in his brains like "fireflies" in a dark night. He is a leader in inventions, a developer of ideas in the domain of science, and is never awed by the word impossible. He lives in the world of ideas, and is constantly fishing for a new one.

The birth of a new idea is accompanied always with some peril. It invariably meets with opposition, but in the end it always triumphs, if founded upon a substantial basis.

But while there are cranks that subserve some high and noble purpose, there are also cranks like the assassins, Guiteau and Booth, that fill a niche in the human family akin to that of the cobra, rattlesnake, and other poisonous animals and insects. Nature has its opposites in the various kingdoms, and they subserve undoubtedly some wise purpose, though mortal vision is too contracted to see it. All honor, then, to the progressive crank; but the poisonous kind should at once be confined within the walls of a prison where their devilish ways could be held in abeyance and opportunity for reform given. While some cranks are the saviors of the world, are spiritual in nature and highly developed, others are the reverse of them, and claim to be controlled by God or Jesus, or some high archangel, and they are so exalted that they can "learn" no more from any mortal. They are to be pitied.

"The Kingship of Self-Control." By Wm. George Jordan. It treats of the crimes of the tongue, the Red Tape duty, the supreme charity of the world, the revelation of reserve power, etc. Price 30 cents. For sale at this office.

Wireless Telegraphy.

The scientists of the world are close upon the heels of Spiritualism in prying into the hidden forces of nature.

Marconi, the Italian wizard of the twentieth century has demonstrated by an invention he calls the coherer that there are elements or waves upon which the thoughts of man can be conveyed from one point to another without connecting wires and the world is startled, and stocks in telegraphic deals went down.

What next? Here comes Prof. Fessenden with an instrument still more sensitive, he claims, than that of Marconi, and another step is taken, and as Garrett P. Serviss says in the Chicago American:

"Never before has there been such a rush of explorers and discoverers to a scientific El Dorado, and science, perhaps, never presented a new field so incredibly rich in practical possibilities as this one is.

"It begins to look as if the practical science of the future may rest upon electric waves. They are everywhere—in the earth, in the air, in the sun, in the stars, in so-called empty space. They are akin to light, they are akin to heat, they are akin to life itself!

"They may account for that insoluble enigma of all philosophy, the birth of thought. The thoughts of our brains, that come flashing in upon us, we know not whence or how, may be but transformations of electric waves lapping the cerebral cells.

"Certain experiments have indicated that the brain cells really are peculiarly susceptible to electric waves. Mr. A. P. Collins has produced evidence that the human brain acts in the presence of such undulations of the ether very much like the coherer of a Marconi instrument.

"Will somebody now go still further and show that we carry in our heads the most sensitive of all electric detectors?

"If that should be done, if it should turn out that the mysterious phenomena of telepathy, thought transference and what not paradox of occultism, are really due to some transcendent form of wave telegraphy, the discovery would not be more essentially incredible than were the things that have been developing under our eyes like a phantasmagoria since Signor Marconi last winter caught a message from England on his kite-borne wire, tossing above the storm-beaten coast of Newfoundland.

"Another step in advance which some thinkers are already dreaming of is the wireless conveyance of electric power. When electric waves actuate a receiver two thousand miles from their source they have transmitted a certain amount of power over that distance.

"It is so slight that it hardly seems worth while to speak of it as mechanical power, and yet it really does mechanical work. Give sufficient energy to the waves and they could be transformed into motive force to drive machines.

"As somebody has already suggested, this would help to solve the problem of supplying airships with motive power without burdening them with the weight of engines. But the problem of transmitting power in this manner will probably prove even more difficult of solution than that of making an airship to satisfy Lord Kelvin.

"Yet nobody can surely tell what is in store for us. The exhilaration of our swift flight from invention to invention gives rise to almost boundless confidence, and we are like children who, dumfounded by the performances of a prestidigitator, rub their eyes and call loudly for more wonders.

"We do not know where the limitations of the powers of our scientific prestidigitators lie, and they do not know themselves."

Truly, these wise men, these instruments in the hands of the spirit world, will stumble onto the powers that guide them into the sea of investigation, some time.

Babylonian Influence on the Bible.

Any light bearing on the origin and nature of the Bible records is of interest to all seekers after exact knowledge, considered in its general aspect, as well as in its particular relations to the religions of the world, and especially in its relation to the Christian religion.

It has for hundreds of years been the claim of Christian writers and accepted teachers, that the Bible in every part was "the word of God," bearing the impress of Divine authorship and inspiration, a true and infallible record, historically and in all things therein mentioned.

This claim has been so long insisted upon and verily accepted and believed, that it must naturally go hard to find that there are other records, antedating the Hebrew records, which go to show that the Hebrew records were drawn from previously existing records, of other peoples, which records were never admitted to possess a claim to Divine inspiration or infallibility.

As stated by Dr. Morris Jastrow, details cannot be discussed and hence one can do no more than refer to the general aspects of other parallels that exist between Babylonian and Hebrew traditions. The story of Adam and Eve no longer stands alone. In the same Gilgamish epic which contains the story of the deluge there is found an episode of a "wild man of the woods" going about naked who associates with the animals of the fields as Adam does (Genesis 2:19-20) until a more suitable mate is brought to him in the shape of a woman. Attracted by her he deserts his former associates and clings to the woman. The Babylonian Adam bears the significant name of Ea-bani, i. e., "Ea creates," or "the creation of Ea." The latter being, according to one phase of Babylonian beliefs, the special god of humanity and the creator of mankind, the first man is called his offspring, whereas the Babylonian Eve is called Ukhat, i. e., "woman," just as the mate of Adam, according to one of the Biblical versions (Genesis 2:23) is called Ish-sha, i. e., "woman." But, again, the same observation is to be made as in the case of the creation and deluge stories.

The stock whence the Biblical and Babylonian tales spring is common, but the development is independent. In consequence the setting is totally different, important variations occur, and the purpose served by the tales is correspondingly unlike.

The Sabbath, as a religious institution, is far older than the Pentateuchal legislation. It can be traced back to a Babylonian prototype, not, however, as a day of rest from labor, but as a kind of atonement day, when by various rites and by observing certain restricted regulations the anger of the gods could be appeased. On this old institution the Hebrews engrafted their religious ideas and produced the unique combination of a day dreaded as a curse from the week's toil which, from being an "unpropicious" occasion, a dies irae, is viewed as a "delight."

The sacrificial ritual of Leviticus presents striking parallels to customs prevailing at an early period in Babylonian temples, but stipulations of a secular character, such as the regulation of trade, the restriction of the creditor's power of the debtor, the land laws, laws of inheritance and the like, more betray Babylonian influences.

There are, however, two sides to this influence. While Babylonian models were followed in certain respects, it is also manifest that the Pentateuchal legislation is pervaded by a spirit of opposition to Babylonian conditions. Such laws as the prohibition to take interest for money loaned to one in distress (Exodus 22:24; Leviticus 25:36; compare Psalms 15:51) is a protest against the business of money lending as carried on in Babylonia, where thousands of tablets found beneath the mounds reveal the extent to which this enterprise was developed in the commercial centers of the Euphrates Valley. Of course, without money lending commerce on a large scale cannot be carried on, but this is exactly what the Pentateuch aims to avoid. The ideal which it holds up is not commerce but agriculture. It has no sympathy with commercial expension; it does not hold out the hope—nay, it distinctly discourages the prospect—of the people becoming the rivals of the Babylonians and Phoenicians, the great merchants of antiquity. The progeny of Abraham is to be "as numerous as the sands of the sea," but nowhere is wealth held up either as a goal or even a possibility.

The picture which the compilers of the Pentateuchal codes had in mind was that of each man sitting with his family under the shade of his fig tree. Every paterfamilias was to own the land which he cultivated. Country life is given the preference over city life. Hence interest is intentionally tabooed as the effective blow against converting the people into a commercial nation. Such a regulation, again, which prohibits the people from owning land—a certain number of cities being merely set aside in order to furnish a revenue—is evidently aimed against Babylonian conditions, where the temples were large landowners and had, in fact, developed into enormous business establishments, lending money, farming lands, engaging in real estate transactions and in manufactures. The spirit of Pentateuch is utterly opposed to such a development of priestly prerogatives. The priest was to remain poor, obtaining sufficient for his sustenance, but no more, and as for the Levites—the great body of attendants in the temple—they are put in the same category with the widow and orphan as recipients of charity.

We are glad to note indications of increase of interest in the work of Progressive Lyceums. It is a healthy sign, and we hope to see the interest spread more and more, until such schools shall be established in connection with every society of Spiritualists, and, indeed, even where organized societies of Spiritualists may not exist. This is perfectly feasible, even where but one or two families of Spiritualists join in the work. All, old and young, who take part therein may be richly benefited, and find recreation, pleasure and mental and spiritual profit in the exercises.

Such manuals as Tuttle's Lyceum Guide will afford all needful assistance in forming and conducting lyceums, and supply all desired information concerning methods and management.

Those who engage therein will find the work conducive to the awakening of thought, and to healthful growth in knowledge of spiritual truth.

Spiritualists may wisely learn a lesson from the churches. Where would the churches be, without their Sunday-schools? They would soon dwindle and lose their strength. They would speedily lose their hold on the people, and sink into utter decay. It is the teaching of children, indoctrinating the young in the doctrines and dogmas of orthodoxy, that brings membership into the churches. But for their early teachings in the Sunday-schools, few would ever be brought to accept the doctrines taught in the orthodox creeds.

It is an object-lesson worthy of being pondered by Spiritualists, and made of practical use, in the upbuilding of Spiritualism by means of Progressive Lyceums.

This is a practical work in which all Spiritualists can unite and render good service to the cause and to the world, as well as enhance their own personal growth in the higher things that pertain to life and spirituality.

Spiritualists, whatever you do, do not neglect the culture of your children in the truths and ideas of Spiritualism.

Dr. A. B. Spinney.

Dr. A. B. Spinney, one of the leading lights in connection with Spiritualism in Michigan, if not in the nation, was in Chicago a few days ago. The Doctor is eminently practical as a business man, eloquent and forcible as a speaker, and up with the times as a physician. He is deeply interested in philanthropic work, and is anxious that the prospective Mediums' Home at Reed City shall be made a success. He is an indefatigable worker in the fields of reform, and wherever he may be, his individuality is always felt.

His heart is in his work.

Life with him consists of receiving, and then giving to others in like proportion.

Self-aggrandizement is no part of his nature, only in the measure which he can assist the unfortunate and afflicted.

BEYOND.

Beyond this day and night of life
The land eternal is;
Beyond this land of pain and woe,
Eternal pleasure is.

Oh! who would care for aye to stay
On this side Jordan's wave,
When life eternal waits for us
Among the pure and brave?

This life I trow, is but a span,
A day of toil and care,
A raiment, that when worn and old,
We care not to repair.

These days of earth, how fast they fly,
Ere our good work is o'er,
It may be ours to lay aside
Our books of earthly lore.

So let us, then, be glad of heart,
And while here, faithful be,
And always ever do our part
Then—eternal life we'll see.

DR. COLE LOSES $8,000.

Mrs. Mabel Aber Jackman Taken by Detectives, at Her Temple.

PLAINTIFF, WHO HAD ATTENDED SEANCES GIVEN BY HER, MAKES CHARGES OF CONSPIRACY.

Mrs. Mabel Jackman, one of the leaders of the Spiritualists in Chicago and a widely-known lecturer on religious topics, was arrested at her "temple," 825 North Clark street, yesterday afternoon, charged with being one of three conspirators who succeeded in securing $8,000 of Dr. A. L. Cole's money by means of a "wire-tapping" swindle.

Dr. Cole lives at 313 Superior street, and is interested in the study of Spiritualism. Before the loss of his $8,000 he was a friend of Mrs. Jackman. She introduced him to Edward White and Charles Edwards. The three of them, according to the doctor, induced him to invest a small fortune in an alleged scheme to beat the races and the stock markets. They are said to have claimed they could tap telegraph wires and get advance information that would mean millions to everybody concerned.

FAIR SPIRITUALIST IN JAIL.

White and Edwards were arrested Saturday night at the Westminster Hotel in New York, where they are now being held awaiting the arrival of Chicago detectives.

Mrs. Jackman spent last night in the county jail. Sunday night Mrs. Jackman lectured to an audience in the Masonic temple. Among the most interested listeners were Detectives Rohan and Fitzgerald, who were shadowing her until they could secure a capias for her arrest. Yesterday afternoon, armed with a warrant, they went to the "temple" on North Clark street and asked to see Mrs. Jackman. They were shown into a dimly lighted parlor, and in a few minutes the medium entered.

"Do you want a reading?" asked Mrs. Jackman.

DETECTIVES DECLINE A TRANCE.

"We want to read a warrant to you," said Detective Rohan.

Mrs. Jackman became excited and said she guessed the health department was after her. Then she asked permission to call her husband. The detectives allowed her to leave the room, and a moment after they heard a door slam. Rohan ran out into the hallway in time to see Mrs. Jackman hurrying upstairs, accompanied by her husband. Both detectives hastened after her, but when they got to the top floor Mrs. Jackman said she only wanted to change her dress.

"Well," said Detective Rohan, "Dr. Cole told me the house was full of trap doors and secret passageways, so I guess we won't let you out of our sight."

KEEP AN EYE ON THE MEDIUM.

The detectives refused to leave the room and Mrs. Jackman had to be contented with getting behind a door to change her apparel. Then she was taken to the county jail, accompanied by her husband, who left only when the jail doors closed on her.

According to the police, Dr. Cole was introduced to White and Edwards by Mrs. Jackman last January. They are said to have unfolded a scheme to the doctor by which they could beat the races and stock market without fail. All they needed was money to put the plan into operation. Dr. Cole listened and advanced $2,000.

DUMMY WIRE INSTALLED.

A house at Thirty-first street and Indiana avenue was rented and, it is said, a complete set of dummy wires was installed. Then something went wrong and Dr. Cole advanced another $2,000. For some reason or other, which White and Edwards are said to have had no trouble in explaining to Dr. Cole, things never did connect, and after $8,000 of Dr. Cole's money had gone into the venture he awoke to the fact that he might have been defrauded. He went to Lieutenant Andy Rohan with his story. White and Edwards were in New York, but a telegram to Captain Titus led to their capture.—Chicago Inter Ocean, May 6, 1902.

This notorious woman, prominent as a medium in the past, has been repeatedly exposed in the columns of The Progressive Thinker.

Only a few weeks ago we published the affidavits of three prominent eastern gentlemen, illustrating her real character, showing her up in her true light.

The management at Lily Dale will not admit her to their grounds to exercise her mediumship.

Just think of it, reputable Spiritualists, this woman, arrested and in jail, advertising herself as "Rev." Mabel Aber Jackman. It makes one blush with shame.

On the programme last out advertising the meeting of this notorious woman, we find the name of Isa Wilson Kayner. Mrs. Kayner is a splendid medium, and her name was appropriated without her consent to place on the programme to give it prestige.

To illustrate this disgraceful affair further, we give the following from the Chicago Chronicle of May 9, 1902:

"SPIRITS" AS THIEVES GET $8,000—SEANCES LEAD TO DR. A. J. COLE'S RISKING CASH AND LOSING IT—FEMALE TRANCE MEDIUM AND TWO ALLEGED CONSPIRATORS ARE ARRESTED.

Mysteries of the black art and frequent seances at which it was alleged a voice from the spirit world advised heavy speculation in the stock markets and at various race tracks figure in the arrest yesterday of Mrs. Mabel Aber Jackman, a trance medium, and Frank Edwards, alias Frank Grace, and George White, alias Stillson, said to be notorious confidence men and wire-tappers. All are charged with swindling Dr. A. J. Cole, a north side physician, out of $8,000.

Mrs. Jackman was arrested at her home, 823 North Clark street, by Detective Sergeants Morgan and Rohan of the central station, and Edwards and White were arrested in New York city on telegraphic descriptions. All have been indicted by the grand jury on charges of conspiracy.

WILL BE BROUGHT HERE.

Both prisoners now held in New York will be brought back to Chicago for trial, and in the meantime Mrs. Jackman will be held in the county jail.

The police are inclined to believe that the success of the alleged swindlers was due largely to the influence of Mrs. Jackman over Dr. Cole and his belief in the information he received from the supposed spirits at the seances held at her home.

"Invest your money freely and don't be afraid of losing, as such a thing is impossible," is said to be the message delivered to Dr. Cole by one of the spirits, and at the same time this was delivered the physician is said to have occupied a seat between Edwards and White, facing the darkened room in which the seance was held.

TOLD ALL WOULD BE RICH.

Edwards, White and Dr. Cole, according to the police, were the chosen three and the advice from the spirit world was to the effect that all would make fortunes in speculations. Dr. Cole, the police say, has since admitted to them that at the time he was unable to hear the voice of the spirit, but that the information was given to him by Edwards and White, who both claimed to have heard plainly the command to speculate.

The above extracts from the Chicago Chronicle and Inter Ocean illustrate a most pitiable phase of Spiritualism. Mrs. Jackman, instead of being arrested and confined in jail, might have occupied the highest pinnacle of fame in our ranks; might have been a leader, a molder of character of high spirituality, an influential agent for good on the rostrum and at our camps, and a favorite child of the angel world. Poor woman, we pity her from our inmost heart, for we do not believe that she possesses at the present time a particle of genuine mediumship. A skillful lawyer will probably clear her, on some technicality, but the bad effects of her arrest will cling to her during life.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

Prof. Lockwood paid this city a flying visit last week. His last lecture was delivered in Pittsburg, Pa., to an audience of 2,500. His lectures throughout the East have attracted a great deal of attention. His method of scientific analysis and demonstration, whereby he brings to the front nature's cosmic forces and establishes thereby grand spiritual truths, seems to be exactly what our cause demands. He stands alone in this special domain, the one man whose trend of mind and capacity enables him to intuitively grasp the grand spiritual truths underlying our philosophy, and make them stand forth so plainly from a scientific standpoint, that the average mind can grasp them.

The Professor's principal work has been confined to the East, and all along the line he has met a hearty reception. He should be employed more in the West. He has elaborate scientific apparatus, some of which was purchased in Europe at great expense, and thus equipped he reveals nature's cosmic forces in a manner so charming and instructive, that he holds the attention of his audience to the conclusion.

To establish Spiritualism on a solid, substantial basis along new lines of thought, is something novel and interesting in this fifty-fifth year of its existence, and that is what Prof. Lockwood has been doing in various parts of the country.

Spiritualist Schools—What Shall We Do with the Graduates?

I have noticed a number of articles for and against the Morris Pratt Institute and similar institutions, and while I am not opposed to the idea of educating our public workers, yet there is one question I would like to ask in all seriousness, and that is simply this: What shall we do with the graduates? Of course if a young man or woman goes to these institutions to be trained for public work, they will hope to receive public patronage after they graduate; that is to say, they will need engagements from societies or encouragement from private individuals in order to continue in the work of educating the masses in the principles of the grand philosophy of Spiritualism, and subjects which are germain to that philosophy. But the question arises, Will they receive sufficient encouragement to enable many of them to continue steadily in the work?

Answer.

In the light of past experience many of our good workers can say no, unless they have some kind of sensational mediumship to attract the attention of the masses; simply as teachers of a grand philosophy of life they will be disappointed.

There are many capable workers in almost every state of the Union who can testify to the truth which I have written.

A man or woman can be a good, faithful worker as a speaker—able to give good logical reasons for his or her position as a public advocate of our philosophy, and yet in many of our best centers for spiritual work be met with a cold shoulder unless there is some phenomenal medium to follow.

Is this a fair statement of the case?

Ask any public worker who does not give tests after the lecture.

Is this fair dealing on the part of societies and the masses of Spiritualists?

Not at all.

If a speaker does the part well which he sets out to do, he should meet with a fair reception at the hands of Spiritualists everywhere.

People need the teachings of Spiritualism as well as the tests.

They should have both when convenient, but they need the philosophy of life anyhow, whether they get tests after every lecture or not.

How many of our old speakers, who do use pretty good grammar, who have been educated reasonably, will get steady employment?

These are vital questions, and to be considered in a discussion of the subject in hand.

In conclusion: The teachings of our grand philosophy are needed by the masses, who have no appreciation of their beauty or usefulness.

There is room for legions of workers, but in view of the fact that so many Spiritualists oppose organization or agitation, how can the teachers and the masses be brought together?

MEMORY.

On and on the years have flown,
We cannot hold them here—not one.
But on, with swift, relentless sweep,
They pass; into that unknown deep
Of future years, wherein will lay
The garnered treasures of to-day.

Time counts all things his own—I ween;
The present is not what it seems,
Ours; the best of all we do and are,
Belong to ages waiting far.
So pass the years with steady flow;
The changing seasons come and go;
Each one some part of life will give,
Renewing hope that bids us live.

Then memory comes with smiling face,
And backward all those years will trace;
Each hour a hallowed thing will be,
So filled with meaning unto thee:
Prophetic of that wondrous power,
That holds the incense of the flower
Sweet—with all its beauty fled;
And love—when all our hopes are dead.

MARY WEBB-BAKER.

LEADING A LITTLE CHILD.

A Visit from the Angel of Death.

To-night, as the sun went down, leaving the city of Brooklyn to the embrace of the breeze that came in from the ocean, we were standing in the doorway of the beautiful home of a friend, talking to the lady of the house, when a small, weary, poorly-dressed woman slowly ascended the brown stone front door steps, timidly, slowly leading a little girl, about four years of age. The woman had once been handsome, but whatever of beauty she had in the past was now buried under a motley load of care, grief and sorrow, marking a struggling life, as a fair flower in a yard may have its life pounded out under the pitiless pelting of stuff thrown out as junk and making a pile of dead weight of no use to any one. Books may be told by their binding and title pages. So, too, can women, wives and mothers be told and known by their binding or dress, and by the title pages that all of humanity carries in the face and the lines thereon. Did you ever, when riding along a dirt-laden road, see an eddying, twirling current of air lift dust, dirt and rubbish up and gyrate it, as if to show you something unpleasant? Thus came the woman and her little girl, with an uplifted story of grief, and trying to rise from the dust and dirt of untoward circumstances. We could read in the lines on her face, the timid, scared look in her eyes, the labor-marked form, and the lack-lustre look of a hungry child's eyes, a history of disappointment and neglect—of labor beyond her strength; of hope deferred and loads accumulated to be borne till the heart grew sick. The reading of the book, at a moment's glance, was not pleasant, but depressing.

"Not at present. He went out just after dinner."

"Do you know how soon he will return?"

"No. He is from home on a business call and may be here in a few moments and it may be an hour ere he returns. Will you enter and wait or call again?" pleasantly asked the wife of the absent man.

"I will call again, as I wish to see him soon as I can."

Then the poor woman slowly retraced her way down the stairs and along the sidewalk, showing that the woman physical as well as the woman mental, was carrying a heavy load, in token that she would soon again become a mother.

"There goes a woman laden with grief—a life that is heavier than lead."

"Evidently. I believe that she is the wife of a man whom my husband discharged to-day, for good and sufficient reasons. For visiting saloons, and other acts of which he may tell you."

Our little ones go with skips, hops and jumps. They shout and laugh as they run. They nod to each other and to the trees above as do flowers in the field. The woman who went her way, holding a poorly-clad, pinched, hungry, saddening child by the hand, went as goes a funeral procession, but not till at least one heart had been made heavier by what it had seen and felt.

When the man of the house came, he told us of the woman who had led the little child. A few years ago she was a bright, happy, beautiful girl, just jumping into the garden of life which revealed to her only flowers and budding vines. She was met by a gay young man. He could gracefully smoke a cigar. His moustache was waxed and petted. He had learned to drink, as the liquor sellers had said, to be manly and popular with the men and girls. He could sing a song and urge something of music out of a piano. He was a young man, brought up in idleness, supported by his hard-working parents, made much of because he was so pretty, but never taught anything useful or directed to any vocation the following of which bring health, strength, and more and more of articles to prove that man is the son of our Common Father, the Great Creator.

Physically attracted to each other, in time these two were married. The parents of the unfitted young man could not support the young wife. He could not support the one he married. He could hunt around the city for work, but nothing less than a choice position at high salary, would satisfy him, when he had no ability, or fitness for any place of usefulness to others.

His wife was of far better stuff. She accepted the situation, though her heart went down. She sought and found employment. She sewed carpets, and thus earned wages. She did the lion's share of the work, and ere a year had passed from date of her marriage, a child came to call her mother. Its coming soured the words of the husband and added to her loads. He took to drink. She took to the needle while yet in bed to recover the exhaustion of the ordeal she had passed through. She had two children to care for. One was her husband who was of no account, the other was her babe. It was not long before the second child came. Then she had three persons besides herself to care for. Her husband's brother, lazy as he was fat, came to be cared for and supported. Tears fell into the stitches she took as she forced the needle through stiff carpets, even as life was forcing thorns into her soul.

One day the good angel of Death, who never yet did a human being harm, seeing how heavily the poor woman was loaded, kindly took one of her little children in its arms and bore it on to the beautiful school grounds and the play fields in the Land of the Leal, where little ones are loved, cared for, educated and grow apace as they journey on to the ever-widening fields of the future. Then her husband took more to drink and to laziness. He saw that he owned a slave, from whom children could be forced and whose fingers could earn him food, clothes and drink-money. He was a man. A husband. A father. A sovereign citizen. Never was a slave lashed to labor more than he lashed his wife by the power given him over her. She could not escape. Daily and hourly were loads piled upon her. Her beauty faded. Her form lost its elasticity. Her life was made darker and heavier. Death would have been relief. Separation from her torture would have been relief, but her husband owned her body and soul. He demadned his marital rights. At times he found a few days' employment. Then hope raised in her heart, and she worked the harder. Then he would lose his position and more of load would be thrown on her.

Some weeks ago a kind-hearted, humane, progressive, useful man of push and business, who had known her when she was a child, gave to her husband employment. Then he gave to her an opportunity to earn a few dollars as well. Thus food was obtained for two little children, who often had tasted no food for an entire day, though the husband had his drinks and his lunch from the counter of those who thus lure labor from some and their earnings to the hand that is hellish in the reach for gain.

To-day the husband was found to be so unfaithful and so demoralizing to other employes, and so inclined to pocket what was not his own, that his discharge was necessary. He persisted in frequenting saloons—in drinking until unfitted for labor. In taking what was not his own, and selling the same to pawnbrokers for the means to spend in drink. Then to his wife he again went, weak, nervous, powerless, discharged. The last place closed against him.

The wife, leading one little child, carrying another in addition to her load of grief, and doubly grievous the load, went forth to beg that he might be tried again—just once more, and yet she knew that there was left no honor, no manhood, no support, comfort and protection to her and her little ones to be found in or coaxed out of the owner of a woman.

Divorce? No. The law as made by men who own women and count upon their services in ways not necessary to mention, says that women cannot be freed from a husband, no matter to what degree of brutishness he attains by companionship and igniting of passion, unless he can be proved guilty of adultery. He may beat, bruise, maim, torture, emasculate, terrify, horrify, hold and hound a wife so long as she can be made to increase the heat of his body till she is worn into a coffin, and her body left to be buried at public expense, but cannot be relieved from marital obligations. She may wed a man who, under the pressure of those who despoil homes and happiness, may develop into a being lower and worth less than any brute, yet from him there is no escape.

And, oh, how full the world is of wrecked lives and wives. Of good women who are daily crucified and nightly tortured. Of wives whose daily lives are daily writhings in hell. Of children who are robbed, starved, whipped, neglected, tortured and murdered by inches, under the drift of the drunkard and power of the drunkard-maker. And to plead for humanity is counted as a crime against politics and an interference with the paid-for rights of those who live only to destroy others. How much we have to think of, this waning Saturday Night!—Brick Pomeroy.

A RIGHTEOUS JUDGE.

The Double Standard in Morals.

It seems to be decreed that humanity shall make haste slowly, very slowly; but it is pleasant to know that the advance, though slow, is nevertheless steady.

The miserable pessimism which would point back to the former days as having been "better than these" is wholly without warrant. They were not better. The grandest days that the world ever saw are the days that are now passing.

To-day there is more good in the world, more truth, love and justice, than there ever were before. Not yet has perfection come, there is still room for a vast improvement, but the signs and tokens of progress are manifold and these signs and tokens are clear to all save the few idiots and the small posse of chronic dyspeptics.

And one of the more hopeful signs of the times comes from California in the shape of a decision by Judge Hall, of Oakland.

A somewhat prominent gentleman in that city by the golden coast applies for a divorce from his wife on the ground that she is in the habit of staying out late at night, getting home sometimes at the unseemly hour of 2 in the morning, while occasionally she remains out all night.

The irate husband declares that his wife has the audacity to claim that she has an equal right with her husband to spend the nocturnal hours outside of the home, and he furthermore testifies that when questioned in the morning as to where she has been over night she gives any kind of explanation she likes, or none at all, just as it happens to please her.

In the meantime the wife, having burned the bridges behind her, shows no indications of fear, no sign that there is in her thoughts the remotest idea of retreat.

She faces the enemy with a bold, undaunted front, which seems to say, "Here I am, and here, by the help of my good courage, I propose to remain!"

For a moment or so after the plaintiff's petition is filed there is silence in the court-room and then the hush is broken by the clear, ringing voice of the avenging Nemesis.

Realizing the importance of the principle at issue, and realizing, too, that the time is come to give Old Custom a solar plexus blow that shall send it reeling to the earth, the Judge rises from his chair, folds his arms composedly across his breast, and, looking down upon the parties to the suit, says: "A wife has just as much right to stay away from home nights as the husband has!"

"Then," says the wife's attorney to the court, "I understand Your Honor as meaning that the fact that a wife stays away from home all night is not ground for a divorce, since husbands frequently do the same?"

"Just so," replied the Court. "It is as broad as it is long. If it is wrong for the wife to stay out from her home at night it is just as wrong for the husband to do the same. If the fact that the wife stays out at night gives the husband the right to divorce her, then the fact that the husband stays out at night gives the wife the same right to divorce him. It is six of one and half a dozen of the other."

Righteous Judge! Thou hast earned the eternal gratitude of every right-thinking man and woman on the planet.

Right is neither male nor female, knows nothing about sex, and is one and the same thing in man and in woman.

O Righteous Judge! Thou hast spoken well. Thou hast declared the old eternal truth. Thou hast administered a timely and much deserved rebuke to the Caesars who imagine that there is a double standard of morals, one for themselves and one for their wives. "Caesar's wife must be above suspicion," but Caesar can do as he pleases.

Not so, Caesar, not so! You are as much bound by the law of truth and decency as your wife is, and it is as bad for you to disgrace your wife as it is for your wife to disgrace you.

Drunkenness, lechery, lying, dishonesty, shiftlessness, are not conditional upon sex, do not depend for their heinousness upon the gender of the one who practices them, but are the same degrading and demoralizing things whether practiced by man or by woman.

Does the husband want his wife to honor him? Then let him honor his wife. Does he expect her to be clean? Then let him be clean himself. There is no other way to preserve the sanctity of the home. The double standard has deluged the world with filth. The single standard, and the single standard alone will make it sweet and wholesome.—Rev. Thomas B. Gregory in Chicago American.

= A Lecture =

"For Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us."—I. Cor. 5:67.

The word "Christ" in this passage, is an untranslated word, and means "anointed." A better reading of the passage would be "For the anointed our passover is slain for us." While Jesus was a Christ, or anointed, he was not the only Christ. There were Christs before his time and also after his time. Jesus was slain, if we may credit the biographies given us, on the day before the passover Sabbath; which comes immediately after the first full moon after the vernal equinox, and as the passover lambs were slain at the same time it required no great stretch of poetical figures of speech to make him a passover. He became a passover, by virtue of the time he was slain.

A word or two by way of apology is necessary here. There are a great many people who are horrified when they find a statement verified by something in the Bible. One of the greatest reasons for this is, because their knowledge concerning the spirit of its teachings is so superficial. They think they know all about it, and will quote a long string of very obnoxious texts to prove to you they do. These people will be surprised when they learn that the Bible nowhere professes to be a book of authority, threatening punishments or promising rewards in another life according as people shall accept or reject its teachings. The trouble is, that they have accepted the teachings of those who claim they are the authorized exponents of its teachings.

It may surprise some to learn that the Bible is not a single book, but a small collection of books which was kept by the Jewish people. Some of these were biographical, some historical, some spiritual and some mythological. The biographical were somewhat like our biographical books of this day—they aimed to make heroes of their subjects, by leaving out their faults and extolling their virtues, often at some expense to the truth. The historical, I regret to say, were not always exact, but since we have historians in our times a bit given to exaggeration, we should not complain. The accounts of spiritual manifestations no doubt were overdrawn, but since the relation of spiritual narratives were similar in manner of production and manifestation to occult manifestations of this time, we may be assured they have a foundation in fact. The mythology of the Bible and indeed all pagan books have been sadly misunderstood. Beneath the symbols of paganism and Hebraism were great truths, which for want of a knowledge of the subject taught and our poor comprehension of the tropes and figures used by scholars of ancient times we are unable to comprehend. What the world does not comprehend, it invariably condemns. To philologists and people who want to learn the roads by which modern civilization has reached its present altitude, the Bible is an invaluable book. We do not study the Bible as authority in matters of religion, ethics or conduct, but to find out something. In some sense it interprets to us the ancient mode of thought, and some of the habits and characteristics of people who have bequeathed to us much that has given shape to our lives. We find by a critical reading of the Bible and observing of its literature with that of other books, that many things within it have been wrongly interpreted by us, simply because we have drifted our ideas and changed our environments. Language has also changed and is ever changing, so that words have lost their former meaning.

To illustrate, the word "God" has now a very different meaning from that it represented in some of the earlier mythologies, including the Hebrew. Once it was limited to the forces of nature, referred to astrology or spirits of departed men and women. The word OM or AUM was all-inclusive in its meaning. It usually referred to the potency and directness of infinite nature. The Infinite was not only incomprehensible, but it was also unspeakable. It was not matter, neither was it the essence of matter, but a sublimation of the essence of matter. It had no locality, and though it infilled all matter it could scarcely be said to be an attribute of matter. It would be more proper to speak of matter as a property of AUM.

At this time many people are disputing over what they call God. A thinking man would not enter into any of their disputes. A God who is supposed to rule the universe must be infinite in all his parts, and as such a being is beyond description and even comprehension, his existence can neither be proved nor disproved—it must be perceived by the spiritual senses or not at all. It may indefinitely be conceived, but no one can conceive it for another, and that a man cannot conceive it for himself is no evidence that he is incorrigible; neither should we regard a man who believes such an entity in the universe as superstitious.

Religion proves to us, as many other things do, that there has been a civilization in the world little inferior in some respects to the civilization which we pride ourselves belongs exclusively to this age. We are apt to condemn people who pass judgment without previous investigation on Spiritualism. Yet we as Spiritualists treat other religions in the same way. Men who bring down the applause of an audience by their condemnation of the Bible, often know as little of the spirit of its teachings as those who condemn Spiritualism know of the spirit of its teachings. All religions have a common origin, and all are in very many respects similar. And I might say, nearly all have a basis of Spiritualism mixed with their astrology and nature worship.

CYCLES.

In most of the great religions, time is divided into cycles. Anciently, time was divided into days, weeks, moons, years, etc., and, excepting weeks, each period was again divided into a light and a dark half, thus claiming that these divisions exist in nature and are independent of all artificiality. A week was the fourth part of the moon, the end of which was celebrated as a sabbath, the word meaning sun worship, the moon only being a time keeper to direct the mind to the proper time for worship. All of the feasts, and I might say the whole ritual of the Jewish religion was regulated by the moons—generally the new moon. As the moon could not be equally and exactly divided without breaking the day into fractions, it was assumed that there were 28 days in a moon, and that it quartered each seven days. The sabbath would then come on the last of each quarter. We are told that Abraham came out of Ur of the Chaldees, where we find the divisions of time exactly corresponding to that afterwards adopted by Moses and the Hebrews. The Hebrew sabbaths came somewhat artificially, and perhaps the Chaldean sabbaths did also, and did not follow the exact divisions of time as marked off by the moon, gaining a day in the time of each moon. This probably was because they misunderstood the purposes of the sabbath, but this defect was compensated for by making the moon a measure for the division of time. The moon or month was made to correspond with the 24-hour day. It was a day, having a light half and a dark half.

The years were also divided into a light and a dark half, or into a day and night, regulated by the motions of the sun in its descent into the southern skies and its reappearance again into the northern skies. But like the moon the sun loses a little time in reaching the same point in the heavens each year. That is, he seems to fall back in the ecliptic. This is called the "precession of the equinox," and amounts to about one degree in 72 years. This the Hindoos call a Saura year, or day, and is supposed to have a light and dark half to it, for the Hindoo was very precise in his cycles and supposed everything in nature to be a type of something still greater. The loss of time each year which in 72 years amounted to one degree would in 2,154.86 amount to 30 degrees, which would take him out of that sign into the next one. This he supposed to be composed into a light and dark half, and was called a Brahma day. Then there was a day of the Gods which was only reached once in 25,856 years, when the sun had fallen back through the entire circuit of the heavens or the twelve signs of the zodiac. This was supposed to occur in the sign of Scorpio, and at that time, all the planets would arrive at the same point in the heavens with the earth. And then the earth would be burned up with fire. In Grecian mythology we are told that when Phœbus drives the chariot of the sun around the universe, when he comes into the Constellation Scorpio, he drives so near the earth that he sets the world on fire and burns it up. I believe all religions contemplate a universal conflagration, when the earth will melt with fervent heat. I presume any schoolboy would be capable by taking the planets and dividing this time by their periods learn whether the planets would actually get together in that length of time. If they should it would be difficult to tell what might happen. Last year when Jupiter, Saturn, the earth and Venus were in line with the sun, the electric forces became so disturbed that the intense friction thus caused made the heat almost unbearable. Think what would be the result if nine instead of four planets were to get in line. Fortunately, however, the sun at this time is supposed to enter Scorpio at the time of the vernal equinox, which being three months before the summer solstice gives the earth time to move three signs out of the line before the sun's heat shall combine with the heat caused by the friction of the planets.

But there is to come out of all this a new earth. It will then be purified of all that was evil and will commence a new era of sinlessness. Thus we learn the origin of many things which have now become sacred to us, and we also learn that the men we call pagans, were not so simple-minded as we thought they were.

Then there were other cycles, also, in the Hebrew religion, and I believe also in the Chaldean religion. Among the Chaldeans Astar, or Istar, the moon, was exalted as a deity, and through the authority of this deity by its example time was divided into sevens. In fact sevens and twelves are both sacred numbers, the one dividing the moons and regulating the summer months and the other dividing the year. As we have seen in mythology each year is called a day, nothing would be more natural than that an immense moon should be hypothecated to correspond to the moon controlling the days. Thus they found authority for their sabbatical years, and every seventh year was set apart as a sabbatical year, in which the land was to rest. Everything in their fields and on their vines were given over to the poor. These sabbatical years were again multiplied by themselves, and the fiftieth year was made a year of jubilee. On this year all debts were canceled and all bondmen or slaves were given their liberty and allowed to commence life anew. This was to them the end of the age often translated to us the end of the world, and it commenced on the tenth day of the seventh month, measuring the months from the first new moon after the vernal equinox. The first jubilee was celebrated in B. C. 1451, and the last one in B. C. 600. I shall want to call attention to these facts shortly.

THE PASSOVER AND EASTER.

The Passover and Easter always occurred at the same time of the year, but only occasionally on the same day of the week. The reason of this was that the Passover occurred on the evening of the 14th day of the first moon in the year, while Easter occurred the first Sunday thereafter. Yees was a title of the sun, and our words yeast, yes, and east and also west come from them. The Hebrew Passover was used, it is claimed, to express the passing over by the angel of death at a time when the Egyptian infants were slain, but it really signifies the crossing over the equator of the earth by the sun, which in doing so not only slew the old year, but also the constellation Aries or the Lamb. The sun is always represented as killing every constellation he passes through. When Samson went down to Timnath you will remember he met a lion by the way and slew him. Samson, or Shem-shem, is the sun and his seven locks representing the seven summer months of the year, and he passes through the constellation Leo or the lion, and thus kills it. Now we read that the next time Samson went that way he found that the bees were occupying the carcass of the lion and had made honey in it. We know that that cannot be literally true, for a bee is a very neat insect, and would not deposit honey in so loathsome a place, neither can we think of a man taking of the honey and eating it. In olden times the constellation Leo was represented by a lion with a honey-bee flying out of his mouth, simply to show that at that time of the year the honey-bee was most active in gathering his honey. So as the sun passes through certain constellations it is represented as killing them. Here, then, we have our Passover lamb—a "lamb slain from the foundation of the world," or age, that is from the time the sun took up his abode in that constellation at the time of the vernal equinox.

In the Egyptian mythology we are told of the death of Osiris. A while ago, I said that Spiritualism forms a basic principle in nearly all religions. Osiris was an Egyptian king and priest, the two offices being confined in one person, as was often customary in early days. His tomb was found in some excavations only about four years ago. Spiritualism was blended with astrology, and for some reason, perhaps because Osiris was translated to the sun, he became a representative of the sun, and instead of killing the constellation, he himself was slain once every year by Typhon, the evil genius. His coffin floats down the Nile and becomes locked in a tree that grows around him. This occurred on the 21st of each December according to our time, but he is found by Isis his wife, and is again brought to life on Christmas day. Thus the old year is put to death, but a new year is born into existence.

Mythros of the Persians was also slain by Ahriman the evil genius. Ormuzd was the supreme Deity of the Persians, and Mythros was a mediator who was required annually to give up his life. Mithraism spread all over Asia nearly two hundred years before the Christian era and was the prevailing religion down till the beginning of the fourth century. Constantine himself was a Mithraist before his conversion to Christianity, and as his Christianity made no change in his ritualism or anything else objectionable with him, the presumption is that he was a Mithraist even after his professed conversion to Christianity. By an edict, however, he required all Mithraists to become Christians. Any observer of human nature readily sees that in such cases men will profess to be one thing, to avoid persecution, while at heart they are another. Instead of becoming Christians, Mithraists just changed names and gave the name of Christian to Mithraism, and made no other change than to accept some of the pagan gods that through the Greeks and Romans had crept into the Mithraic Church and attach to them the names of certain saints. What we now call Christianity is only adulterated Mithraism.

Thus it came about that Christianity abandoned its Passover and substituted the Easter of Mithraism in its stead, including nearly all the other institutions of that cult. The word "Passover," as I said awhile ago, means crossover. The sun crossed the equator at that time, and thus we come to have the equinox—that is, equal nights. Hitherto the nights had been longer than the days, but now they are shortened and for a day or two are of equal length with the days, then the days become longest. This, then, is the day of redemption, and as the lamb is slain by the passage of the sun into the sign of Aries, we are "redeemed by the blood of the lamb." Let it be understood, then, that Christianity did not invent this pharse; it found it already made to hand and appropriated it. When Christianity appropriated it, it was accustomed to paint its crosses with a lamb hanging on it.

Let me say that none of these facts disprove the existence of such a man as Jesus. They only show that in taking up the reformer Jesus, and extolling his characteristics, that they mix Mithraic mythology, just as modern writers take up the biography of Washington and mix into his theology some of this same Mithraism, now called Christianity.

Spiritualism was born on the 31st day of March, 1848, and to-day we are celebrating its 54th anniversary together with the tenth anniversary of this society. There is something remarkable about this. The moon had fulled just the evening before, and this was the first full moon of the year. It came then at the exact time of the Passover, and no doubt in an early day at the beginning of each year at the vernal equinox they regulated their first day of the week accordingly, so that the first day of the week was always the beginning of the year. Thus Easter Sunday commenced on the identical day of the Passover. This is a remarkable coincidence; but there is another coincidence, and that is that the regular time for the Jubilee commenced on the 31st of October of this year. The jubilee had not been celebrated since B. C. 600, and then only in a small way, as it was claimed by Jeremiah that the captivity was a punishment for the offense of violating sabbatical years. The first jubilee occurred B. C. 1451, and the last one occurred B. C. 600, and just fifty jubilees from that time, that is, a jubilee of jubilees, takes us down to the 31st of October, 1848. It is a remarkable coincidence that Spiritualism should have its birth at the right time of the month and year to hit the Passover, and it is still more remarkable that Joshua kept the Passover at the very same time of the year and month, that is what would be our 31st day of March that Spiritualism was inaugurated. I know this to be true, for I have taken the pains to calculate the time of the month as now we count time, it occurred. There are 28 to one chances against having the Passover occur on the same day of the year and month. Had Spiritualism been born a few months earlier or later or even a few hours earlier or later it would have failed to fit in the cycle. It came at a time when several cycles meet in the same year.

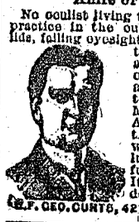
SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS, THE PROMISE OF THE NEW ERA.

Easter is a prophecy of spring and summer; the flowers of Easter are the promise of ripened fruit. It is a time of rejoicing; for then we know that the long reign of Ahriman, or Typhon, or Satan has passed, and that the coming summer will bring us comfort and happiness.

So Spiritualism was the promise of a new era. The dreary mutterings of the pulpit were to either change their tones or be relegated to the darkness of the dark ages where they belong. No more should people be confined to the cold, cheerless theologies which consigns nine-tenths of the world to regions of eternal despair, just because of the freak of an erratic creature, by the blind religion of the day called "God." It was announced that Benjamin Franklin had contrived the scheme by which the world of souls was brought in touch with the world, and the first message to the world was that this was the inauguration of a new era. The communication when rapped out read as follows:

"You must proclaim these truths to the world. This is the dawning of a new era, and you must not try to conceal it any longer. When you do your duty, God will protect you and good spirits will watch over you."

Afterward a letter addressed to Mrs. Fish by her grandfather stated:



"My Dear Child:—The day will come when you will understand and appreciate this great dispensation. You must permit your friends to meet with you and hold communion with their friends in heaven.

"I am your grandfather, JACOB SMITH."

Now friends in Spiritualism, a great trust has been committed to our keeping. Are we worthy of it? It is here for the purpose of enlightening the world. It came in one of the great cycles when it was due. It is a great responsibility that is placed on us. It is the ushering in of the millennium that is entrusted to us. Oh, let us do our work well.

Weak Eyes

All Imperfections of the Eye, Even Blindness, Cured at Home without Use of Knife or Painful Methods.

No oculist living today has had so extensive a practice in the curing of cataracts, granulated lids, failing eyesight, cross eyes and all imperfections of the eye as the eminent specialist, Dr. F. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the consciousness of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

OTHER BOOKS BY LILIAN WHITING:

CRITICAL THOUGHTS

On the Bible, God and Christianity.

The Bible is composed of the Old and New Testaments; it was written in many different parts by many different people, and by those in regard to whose ability and honesty of purpose nothing is actually known to-day. From a vast amount of writings the books of the Bible were made up; the committee selecting the matter for the "sacred volume" had to decide, by votes, which parts are inspired and which were not; and in order to do this they themselves had to be inspired, as infallibility was a necessity.

The amount of written matter from which the Bible was constructed was enough, most likely, for two or three bibles; many parts were rejected by a small majority of votes, while those parts that were to be the Christian's guide and to furnish a basis for his belief in the doctrine of eter[illegible] were adopted, in many cases, by [illegible]e majority.

In order to have produced a book of Divine inspiration every writer and translator of such a book, and every committee selecting matter for the same must have been inspired; a work thus written, translated and compiled we should expect to be entirely free from errors, and to be as perfect as God himself.

Had it been a perfect book its language would have been clear and definite; it would have been adapted to the understanding of people in all the different ages, and there never could have been any excuse for a thousand different denominations of Christians, holding as many different views.

The poorest writer imaginable is the man who cannot express his thoughts so as to be understood by his readers, and this being true what must be our conclusions regarding the ability of those who wrote the Bible? If a being of infinite wisdom and goodness had dictated a bible, for the perfect guidance of his creatures forever, who would expect it to be full of ambiguities; full of contradictions, and worst of all, to teach a multiplicity of doctrines that are known to be false?

If Infinite Intelligence had dictated a bible it would have been just as correct in matters of science as in those of religion; such a bible would never teach us the senseless, geocentric theories; would never hold out the idea that all the heavenly bodies are revolving around our little world; and Copernicus would have found it unnecessary, in 1530, to correct the astronomy of such a bible by substituting the heliocentric for the geocentric idea. That kind of a bible would never tell us that "God made the stars also and set them in the heavens to give light upon the earth." One of those stars is Arcturus, 60,000,000 miles in diameter; is 72 times as broad across its disk as our sun; is 350,000 times larger; gives 5,108 times as much light and heat, and if located where our sun is it would melt and vaporize the earth. If Arcturus were a hollow sphere with an opening in it large enough to receive the earth, and it were possible to drop into such opening every second a planet like ours, it would take 12,000 years to fill the shell; and yet this great blazing sun, capable of holding a hundred thousand solar systems like ours in the grasp of his infinite power of attraction is one of the stars that Moses thought God set in the heavens to give light upon the earth.

About all the recorded evidence extant concerning God is found in the Bible, and relates to a personal God; a God that walked and talked and ate and drank with men; that had physical parts and organs, like men; that could write messages in the sand with his finger; that made blunders, like human beings, and was grieved in his heart on account of the mistakes he had made. This God of the Bible who performed a surgical operation upon a man in order to get a bone upon which to build and round out a full-fledged woman, had made and adorned the garden of Eden and placed therein the parent pair of our race; he had also made a snake, and had placed it, unfortunately, in the same garden with father Adam and mother Eve where it caused their ruin, posterity and all. Although they were not to blame, in the least, for that old serpent being in the garden, God "snaked" them out of Paradise; pronounced a withering and enduring curse upon them, and placed a flaming sword fence around the tree of life, lest they might eat of its fruits and live forever. This God of the Bible, while he was in the cursing business, did not forget the offending and seductive snake that had beguiled Eve and ruined the whole human family, and for that atrocious crime he made the snake crawl on its belly, just like other snakes and millions of other things. O, what a curse, for a snake! Were it a curse upon a snake to make it crawl on its belly it would surely be a curse upon a fish to make it swim, or a curse upon a bird to make it fly. While the story of Eden, including the "Fall of man," is one of the most foolish and absurd fabrications of the dark ages and does not contain a scintilla of truth, it must be remembered that this narrative and the dream of Joseph, in reference to the birth of a savior, are the main pillars of Christianity.

After a few thousand years had elapsed and the drowning regime had failed; and after the fallibility of God, as a Creator and disciplinarian, was painfully apparent, it became necessary for him to do some other wonderful thing in order to retrieve his lost reputation. The world had been going wrong for innumerable centuries; was then hoary with age; millions of people had lived, loved, died and gone—we know not whither—and nothing effective had been done to redeem mankind from the curses of sin, although such calamities as a general flood, wars, pestilence, famine and showers of fire and brimstone had been tried. It then occurred to God that man was so terribly bad that a racial redemption was needed; and after considering the matter further he became so enraged that nothing but innocent blood and physical agony could assuage his wrath and effect a reconciliation between him and mankind. Then followed, in their order, the immaculate conception, the crucifixion, and the redemption of the world from sin through the vicarious suffering of "God's only begotten son."

This God of the Bible whose career was replete with deplorable mistakes; the God who had not learned the principle, that matter is eternal and can neither be increased nor diminished; the God who thought the water of the globe could be increased tenfold by sending it into the clouds, as vapor, and returning it to the earth, as rain, and that caused a rainfall of 20 inches per hour during that terribly damp spell of forty days and forty nights; the God who knew nothing about the prismatic and dispersing action of rain drops, through which a great and gorgeous spectrum, called a rainbow, is cast upon the clouds; the God that humbugged mankind into the belief that the rainbow was a special, miraculous creation, and set in the clouds as a pledge to humanity that he had retired from the flood-making and drowning business; this same God, the same imaginary being who knew so much about religion and so little about anything else, is the God in whose supposed presence millions of Christians bow in adoration and prayer, and the same God, the same figment of the human brain to whom they mumble their incantations over pork and beans. Is it any wonder that the prayers of this nation failed to save Lincoln, Garfield and McKinley, and that no prayers, from the beginning of time until now, have ever been answered?

Christianity is a chain with seven principal links: First, the belief in a personal God; second, in a supernatural creation; third, in the fall of man; fourth, in the immaculate conception; fifth, in a vicarious atonement; sixth, in the existence of two antipodal conditions, heaven and hell; and seventh, in a personal devil, the embodiment of evil. All of these doctrines are taught with great emphasis in the Bible, and if any of them are false the chain is broken and worthless, because we can have no assurance that any of them are true.

In the economy of nature no half hinges, half shells nor half joints are ever made, except in connection with the other halves, because conservative nature never wastes her energies in making useless things. When we pick up a half shell on the sea shore we find on its thick and heavy side an articulating surface and a half hinge; we know they are formed to fit a corresponding surface and half hinge upon the other part of the shell; we are sure that projections upon one half will fit into depressions upon the other half, and that the two halves, when formed and joined by nature, make a perfect home for a shell-fish. Original sin is one of the half shells and half hinges of Christianity; the doctrine of atonement is the other half, and one half is utterly worthless, as a doctrine, without the other.

In the foregoing the writer has tried to give a fair and condensed description of the Bible, including its basic doctrines; has shown, conclusively, the personal character of the Bible's God; has also shown the terribly unreasonable stories that people must believe in order to be Christians; and that the Christian religion depends, for its existence, upon a gloomy and detailed description of events that have never occurred.

Rev. P. S. Henson says: "Within the last decade a wave of infidelity has been sweeping over this continent and has almost overwhelmed the faith once delivered to the saints." That wave began to rise forty years ago instead of twenty, when Darwin gave the world his "Derivative Origin of Species" in 1859; when thinking people began to look upon evolution as the creative and ruling force of the universe; and when Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, Spencer and Wallace, a few years later, arrayed themselves in open conflict with the Mosaic account of creation and became the invincible champions of naturalism, the scientists of the world joined them, and from that time until now evolution, like a constantly swelling tide, has flooded the whole domain of thought.

Swedenborg, Kant and Laplace had discovered and amplified the Nebular Hypothesis through which to account for the creation, in a natural way, of the stellar and planetary universe; the theories accounted for nearly all the known facts; were generally accepted; and later, when Darwin's ideas were accepted as the second and concluding stage of evolution, the belief in a natural creation became general.

By this time the lamp of reason was burning too brightly for the church, with its ancient superstition, to dominate the world, and, therefore, scientists and our beloved Ingersoll were all safe from the blazing fagots; but the feeling against Darwin and his teachings was as bitter, doubtless, as that which caused Calvin to secure the conviction of Servetus for heresy, in 1553, a supposed crime for which that noble man was burned alive at the stake.

The wave of infidelity that has been sweeping over the world for forty years never can be restrained because it is opposed only by the falsehoods and myths of remote and ignorant ages. The efforts of ministers and sectarian schools to check such a wave and resist the rising power and logic of naturalism are almost as futile as those of the old lady who tried to beat back the flood tides of the ocean with a mop, and Christianity must perish from the earth because all of its principal doctrines are false.

Every town with a true scientist contains a man holding a torch with which he is striving to light the world, while every town with an orthodox minister contains a man that is trying to blow it out.

THE VOICE DIVINE.

Am I divine? Am I a God?
What is in me, that I, a rod,
Should feel in all this fret and fume,
This jar and tumult in my cosmic loom?
What am I? I, that worshipers bow low,
Offering of incense and of prayers to do,
Or this or that? Must I a changeling be,
That thus I feel the throbs of wide humanity?
I, that am ALL, pulsating everywhere,
My sensing self in forms and viewless air;—
The Whole am I; yet feel chaotic strife
Urging yet greater manifests of life.
Devouring; being; change into change; relate,
Part to its part; none in a perfect state,
Needing of all and held to each in turn.
The cold, hard stone, my grandly chiseled urn
Wherein I hold my glorious Flora, found
Where'er is the alemble of the air and ground;
Most precious treasure, varying infinitely,
For beast and bird a grand felicity.
Up through these all and out from light and air
I grew to BE in power and wonder fair;
I touched new springs, potential still, I saw
New ways to work, new combinations draw,
New pipes to thrill, new melodies to wake,
New harmonies to feel, new happiness to make,— Infinite? Yea! Nor end nor cease I know!
Forever on and on! Eternity shall show
Indeed of ME. The great I AM, am I, God! All there is; in all there is; from man to man I cry,
Lo! I am thee, and thou art me! Be satisfied;
And up the hills and o'er the shining plains
Take thou thy way, while from thy forehead rains
Life essence, I! the Om eternally,
Working and striving thus, only to DO and BE.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

"God is a God of the Living, and not of the Dead—A reply to the Rev. Dr. Hirsch, when he said, 'I will preach no more funeral sermons.'" The above will be the subject of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond's address at Handel Hall, No. 40 Randolph street, Next Sunday. She should have a large audience.

Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt may be addressed for camp or society engagements, at 498 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill., or at The Progressive Thinker office.

Harry J. Moore who has proved a great favorite at Rochester, Ind., as a lecturer, will respond to calls to attend camp-meetings. Address him at No. 773 Sixty-third Place, Englewood Station, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. McKinley Creighton, the well-known medium, has left Chicago, and will take up her residence in New York. Her husband is now foreman of the New York Commercial, a very lucrative position.

James A. McElroy desires engagements with societies in Indiana, from May 10 to June 30. Address him at No. 1311 Second avenue, Evansville, Ind.

The Milwaukee Sentinel has the following from Fond du Lac, Wis.: "According to a local Spiritualistic medium this city is to be visited by three costly fires within the next three months. They are to be three of the large business buildings, so the information from the spirit world says. The medium has given the owners and occupants of the three doomed buildings warning of the impending disaster and advised them to invest heavily in insurance, for, the medium says, 'the calamity is as certain as anything can be.' The information has been placed in the hands of the police and, though little credence is given the prophecy, the buildings will be more carefully watched than usual."

Prof. Joseph Singer has left Chicago, and is now located at 421 E. Rich street, Columbus, Ohio. The Professor has a host of friends in this city.

Forty centuries of superstition are defied by the White Star Steamship Company, which has decided to start ocean liners on their trans-Atlantic voyages on Fridays. Hitherto all the steamship companies have respected the Friday lunacy.

The captain of a recruiting vessel recently adopted a novel method of getting natives to enter into contract with him on the island of Malayta. He secured a phonograph, and before leaving Queensland had a native already engaged on a plantation, talk into it, telling of the good time he was having. This was taken to the native villages and turned loose. The natives flocked to the recruiting ship.

E. R. Keech writes: "For various reasons the Spiritualists of Rockford, Mich., at their last annual meeting decided to change its second quarterly and hold it earlier; therefore it will be held on Sunday, May 25, instead of in June as formerly. All interested take note of change. Mrs. A. E. Sheets, of Grand Ledge, is engaged as speaker, and Mr. and Mrs. D. A. Morrill, of Grand Rapids, trumpet mediums, will also be present."

Mrs. F. D. McCormick, Billings, Montana, writes: "Our little band of Spiritualists who compose a portion of the inhabitants of Billings, would greatly appreciate a visit from some reliable medium, a trumpet medium who can come well recommended preferred. Our home circle, which consists of several members, meets every Thursday evening, but the results are not satisfactory, and we would greatly appreciate the help of some good medium having developing powers. If some one, lady or gentleman, coming this way will stop off at Billings we will do all in our power to make the visit both pleasant and profitable."

Geo. H. Miller writes: "Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, missionaries for the N. S. A., were with us at Millersville, Mo., most of the time from April 10th to the 21st, delivering in all eight lectures, followed by readings and tests by Mrs. Kates, mainly of a very satisfactory and convincing character. Mr. and Mrs. Kates have many warm friends and admirers in our community. The result of our meetings was the organizing of a local society here of 21 members, chartered with the State Association, with fair prospects of future growth and development."

E. S. Dillon, prominent as a Spiritualist, in Wheeling, W. Va., speaks well of the work done there by Frank T. Ripley.

William E. Bonney, at present in Blair, Neb., contemplates making an eastern trip, and desires to make dates with societies or camp-meeting associations. Write for liberal terms. General Delivery, Blair, Neb.

W. O. Purvis writes: "It seems to me we cannot lay too much stress on the importance of home circles. Under this head how would it do for the management of our public meetings to always have on hand, either for free distribution or for sale at cost, a small leaflet giving plain short instructions for forming home circles, with a little bit of warning thrown in as to danger from over-indulgence in that kind of experiment. Seems to me a little paper of this kind would get numbers of outsiders experimenting."

Arzella C. Clay writes from Grant, Mich.: "The first day of May being the anniversary of the writer's birthday, the event was celebrated in Grant, Mich. Reading matter was furnished by Susan B. Anthony and Hon. J. E. Roberts, minister of the Church of This World. Some ten letters were received from Spiritualists who are genuine workers in the cause. The good management of Mrs. L. H. Austin for the Spiritualists' Society in Grand Rapids, is worthy a word of commendation. She has not been slow to answer calls of worthy charity, and gives the report that over $90 are in the treasury for a rainy day. This sum is gathered from the Ladies' Aid Society, which we hope will grow in grace and prosperity."

The Lily Dale Camp is still at the front with talent, as the following names indicate: Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing, Rev. Moses Hull, Mrs. Mattie Hull, Miss Lizzie Harlow, Prof. Wm. Lockwood, Mr. J. Clegg Wright, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Mr. F. A. Wiggin, Hon. John J. Lentz, Mrs. Lole Prior, Mr. Lyman C. Howe, Charles B. Patterson, Rev. Anna H. Shaw, Prof. H. D. Barrett, Rev. B. F. Austin, Mr. W. J. Colville, Mr. Thomas Grimshaw.

The Southern California Camp-meeting Association of Los Angeles, Cal., will open this year, Sunday, August 17, and close Sept. 14. Address all communications to J. D. Griffith, secretary, 101½ South Broadway, Los Angeles Cal.

This week's issue of the Presbyterian, published at Philadelphia, devotes space to the so-called "new theology," against which it urges the Presbyteries to stand firm. Incidentally, it refers to the cases of a number of theological students who have imbibed the new theology and been rejected on that account by the Presbyteries to which they applied for licenses. Among such students three from McCormick Seminary are referred to as follows: "Now comes the intelligence that a senior in the McCormick Seminary was rejected by the Presbytery of New Albany because he held Adam to be merely a myth. Two other students from this institution, reported to be unsound in their opinions respecting the authority and integrity of the scriptures, managed to get through the Presbyteries that examined them, but with considerable difficulty." Those who opposed the election of Dr. Riggs at McCormick Seminary called the attention of the directors to the fact that certain McCormick students had been rejected by Presbyteries on account of their views of the scriptures.

Charles Bonsall writes from Salem, Ohio: "The Spiritualist Association of this city was favored by a pleasant visit and two fine lectures from Mrs. Alice Baker, of Cleveland. Her work is educational, and, after all, that is what is needed most. We wish to bear testimony to Mrs. Baker's fine gifts."

Frank C. Pingree told the business men's class of the First Congregational Church that he believed in astrology as a means of pointing a person's way through life. He said that on a recent visit to Boston he visited a seer, who disclosed to him many convincing things. While in Boston about a month ago, Mr. Pingree spoke to some friends of his loss of his pocket-book and a diamond pin, and his hope that some scientific agency might be enlisted in the effort of recovery, mentioning his special preference of astrologers. "Why, there's just such a person up stairs—a Miss Adams," said the friend, who lived in an apartment house. "She seems to have a remarkable gift in that direction. For one thing, she predicted about a month before his assassination that McKinley would be shot. Then she told a friend of mine that her husband would die before he was 40 years old. The lady laughed, saying, 'Oh that can hardly be, for my husband will be 40 in three days. The very next day her husband went to New York, fell out of a fourth-story window and was killed."—News, Detroit, Mich.

The fact is, the last twenty years have wrought among thinking people an enormous change of view as to the practicability, or even advisability, of trying to convert widely differing peoples and races to one common dogmatic creed, especially a stiffly theological creed. Thinking people have found it hard enough to hew their own inherited catechisms into any shape that would stand the test of harmony with recent advances of thought, and, indeed, are simply lost in amazement at trying to fathom how their own fathers could ever have seriously believed that all non-Christian races would be consigned to eternal torments for not embracing certain heart and head staggering doctrines no direct threat of hell could today induce their own sons and daughters to embrace.

A clean-cut intelligent looking man and bright handsome woman have been speaking to small but appreciative audiences in this city the past week on the beauties of Spiritualism. Mr. and Mrs. Kates, missionaries sent out by the National Spiritualists' Association, with their headquarters at Washington, D. C., have been addressing audiences nightly since a week ago. Their theme is not only Spiritualism, but they come with messages of brotherly love. They do not ignore the teachings of Christ, upon which the churches have builded a foundation. On the contrary, they praise his name and refer to the beauty of his life. To them Christ was a Spiritualist possessing in the very highest degree the occult powers. Mrs. Kates is a most impressive talker. She is a well informed woman and speaks with an earnestness that leaves no doubt in the listener's mind where she stands on the subject under discussion. Lectures like Mr. and Mrs. Kates delivered are worthy of larger audiences than they were greeted with in Watseka. At all of the meetings Mrs. Kates would give a few demonstrations of her powers as a medium, which in many instances were remarkable for their accuracy and comprehensiveness. To one she would describe a long dead brother, to another a mother or father, and to others friends. To one man in the audience she said: "I see an old man bent with age; his hair and beard are white and in his hand he holds a cane." "The cane," she said, "is something like this" (taking one from a person in the audience), "only that the handle is more bent or crooked. This old man lies buried across the waters in a little church yard surrounding an old stone church with a square tower. Beside him lie several other members of the family," mentioning their names, "and in one of the graves is Eliza. The stone at the head of her grave is broken and it has fallen lengthwise across the grave, where it now lies." She then gave a minute description of this dead woman as she appeared when in life, and when through the man she addressed said that the dead ones were his father and aunts and uncles and that they were buried in Europe. Many other readings of a similar nature were given, in which those addressed recognized some dead relative or friend.—Watseka (Ill.) Times-Democrat.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance has changed her residence to 0127 Drexel avenue. She would be pleased to make engagements to lecture for societies or at camps; also officiates at funerals. For particulars, address as above.

Mrs. Alice Gehring, slate-writing medium, has gone to Kokomo, Ind. She will work through the state of Indiana.

E. J. Bowtell has open time for lecture engagements in June, July and beginning of August, Niantic, Ct., August 17. Address Box 82 Olneyville, R. I.

Bankson's Lake Camp-meeting, Mich., opens June 14 and closes June 30, Speakers, Dr. B. O'Dell, Dr. Emma N. Warne, Mrs. M. L. O'Dell, Mrs. Augusta Ferris, H. L. Chapman, Lyman C. Howe. Dr. B. O.Dell says: "Bankson Lake is a beautiful spot four and a half miles southeast from Lawton, Van Buren county, Mich, and nine miles west from Schoolcraft, Kalamazoo county, Mich., with the M. C. R. R. to Lawton and G. T. and L. S. M. S. to Schoolcraft. The public needs no introduction to the speakers and mediums secured for our camp session. Dr. Emma N. Warne is one of our ablest workers in the field. Mr. H. L. Chapman is a new worker, but there are few that excel him, and Mrs. Augusta Ferris is among the very best. Lyman C. Howe, that grand old veteran worker cannot be excelled, and needs no commendation; Mrs. N. M. Russell, the gifted and reliable medium, of Grand Ledge, Mich., will be on the grounds and give psychometric readings. Farmer Riley, of Marcellus, the wonderful materializing medium is expected to be present; A. A. Finney, of Grand Rapids, Mich., the celebrated trumpet medium, and many other mediums are expected and all are cordially invited and welcomed. The music will be under the direction of the best vocal and instrumental musician in the state, Mrs. Minnie Marvin, of Lansing, Mich. There is a seance room on the ground, which adds to the comfort and convenience of mediums and investigators. All are cordially invited to come and improve your mind and your health. Come and enjoy one of the pleasantest two weeks of your life."

The elixir of life has been sought after in all ages. A man at Medora, Ill., claims to have found it. That prolonging human life is possible through the proper employment of the will power is asserted by S. V. Keller of that city, who, despite his seventy-one years, walks with elasticity and dash of an athlete, knows no ills and expects to pass the century mark of time. Mr. Keller is one of the pioneer educators of Macoupin county, who has made a diligent study of psychology and claims many things for the mind in its mastery over matter. He now advances the theory that it is in truth the elixir of life. To illustrate his own rejuvenation Mr. Keller danced vigorously and jumped high obstacles with much ease. "See," he said, lightly leaping over the back of a chair, "my legs are as free and easy as a child's. I am younger than I was thirty years ago."

Mrs. J. L. Mathis writes from Wisconsin: "It is only two or three weeks ago that I renewed my yearly subscription, and received that wonderful premium book, 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands,' which I think is grand, and so interesting. Such beautiful books as you do give as premiums, and for almost nothing! I am delighted with them all. Please accept my sincere thanks for same."

The First Spiritualists Religious Society of Clackamas county, Oregon, will hold its annual camp-meeting from the 5th to the 25th of July, in its grove at New Era, Oregon. They are fortunate in securing the assistance of D. W. Hull, and also Rev. Copeland, of Burley, Washington, for the entire season. For full particulars address Lorena Lazelle, secretary, Oregon City, Oregon.

The program for the fourth annual July camp-meeting of the Briggs Park Camp association, Grand Rapids, Mich., is completed and includes the following speakers and mediums: D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, O., comes on for the first five lectures, beginning July 6. He will be followed by Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit for five lectures. July 16 will be set apart for the state association. Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago, will be on for the next four lectures, and will be followed by Mrs. Loe F. Prior, of Atlanta, Ga. Edwin E. Parker, of Ft. Wayne, who is a noted palmist, will be the next attraction, and Harry J. Moore, of Chicago will close the camp, August 3. Besides the help which is expected from the home mediums, W. C. Jessup, trumpet medium; Mrs. Alice Gehring, slate writer, and Mrs. C. I. Critchett, the well-known medium for materialization, all of whom are from Chicago, will be present. W. B. Cole, of Detroit, the "telegraph" medium, has also promised to be here for at least a week.

A. Ratsey writes from Fort Wayne, Ind.: "William Rabel, a young man of 22 years of age, murdered his wife, on Indiana avenue, in this city, after which he was arrested and placed in custody. While in jail he committed suicide by hanging himself. Dr. R. McL. Angus officiated at the obsequies. His remarks were touchingly beautiful, lifting the dark veil between the two worlds, and pointing out to the bereaved relatives and friends the suicide's present condition and to what he might attain by the help and assistance he would receive from their sympathetic thoughts, which they might give him. The service was very affecting. The floral offerings were numerous and beautiful."

Dr. H. H. Alter writes from Watseka, Ill.: "We are few in numbers here, but strong in love and pure sympathy for the cause, and we feel that Mr. and Mrs. Kates have left in our community the very purest and the best ideas that we have ever had."

Rev. T. W. Woodrow, former Universalist minister and pulpit orator, now inspirational speaker, is open for engagement to occupy the Spiritualist rostrum at camp of the season. Terms may be arranged after being heard. Address him at Hobart, O. T.

How to keep the young men and women within the fold in these times of liberal tendencies, is what is worrying the clergy of the Methodist Episcopal church, and doubtless the clergy of other churches also. The spirit of revolt against the old regime of exclusion from so-called "worldly recreations" has become so strong among the younger members of the church as to threaten disruption. "If the clergy of the Methodist Episcopal church expect to keep their young men and women in the fold they must do away with old restrictions against cards, dancing and theatres. If they are not allowed to follow the dictates of their consciences, they will attend churches where they will be allowed to do so, or they will not attend church at all." That was the declaration made at a dinner, attended by 65 prominent Methodist ministers and laymen of Chicago. "If we seek to bind the young people down too closely or draw too tight a rein we cannot hope to keep them with us," was another frank admission, accompanied by the suggestion that laymen and clergymen organize on this question and insist that at the general conference the present regulations and restrictions be removed.

Rev. Dr. C. Hall Cook's engagement at Albuquerque, New Mexico, is extended. He is now delivering a course of lectures on Psychic Photography. These lectures are based upon the results of his own experiments under the strictest conditions as well as upon the authority of eminent scientists and experts in photography. This phase of psychic manifestation as the lecturer shows furnishes a most fascinating as well as strongly evidential demonstration of the objective reality of spiritual forms. Deep interest is manifested as shown by the large audiences in attendance. Dr. Cook is assisted by an excellent platform medium and during the week by an unusually successful psychic in the production of physical phenomena. His address at present is 323 Railroad avenue, Albuquerque, New Mexico.

J. Garnsey writes: "The Progressive Thinker is a very welcome paper in my home, and I hope it may be in thousands of other homes."

"I've come in to buy my coffin. I'm going to die Sunday night at 12 o'clock." These were the words Undertaker Harrington, of Kalamazoo, Mich., heard one day last week from the lips of an elderly man who appeared to be in good health. On Sunday night at 12:15 o'clock Parley Rice, one of the wealthy farmers of Kalamazoo county, passed away at his home in Comstock township. He was an ardent Spiritualist and claimed spirits had told him he was to pass away Sunday night at midnight. Rice firmly believed he had received warning of his final summons and set about making preparations for his funeral. After ordering his coffin and shroud Rice went home and told his wife and hired man to watch over him, for his end was at hand. Sunday he became ill, but his family did not regard his illness as serious. At midnight his wife came to his bedside and joked him about his prediction that he was to die at that hour. "It's 12 o'clock now," she said. "Well, then, the old clock must be fast," replied the sick man, calmly. Fifteen minutes later he was a corpse.—Chicago American.

Geo. F. Perkins is now located at No. 1520 M street, Sacramento, Cal. Mrs. Perkins has been an invalid ever since she left Chicago, and the strain of taking care of her has been very severe on Mr. Perkins. In order to help him, those kindly disposed should send him a dollar for a full reading from the date of birth.

J. B. Orson writes from Washington, D. C.: "I venture a theory on the "fall of man," that to me is entirely new, and may, perhaps, be as good as any previous theory. Man was originally gentle, peaceful and kind while subsisting on fruits, nuts, vegetables, herbs, etc. As numbers increased, resulting in change of habitation, surroundings, environments, etc., lack of nature-products forced a change of diet to fish, flesh and fowl, and with change came the various attributes evolved, absorbed by man, developing new functions, passions, feelings, etc., as a direct result of assimilation of food used. In a few words this is the outline of my theory which may be further investigated by those more competent to do so than myself."

Mrs. Von Kanzler is making a good impression at Elmira, N. Y. In one of her addresses there she said: "The speaker believed in the home altar. There should be one in every home in Elmira where all should come together and sing, harmonize their spiritual natures and be satisfied of the truth, have knowledge for themselves and be able to say 'I know!' She wanted all to know this flood of incoming intelligence from the spirit world. Those who refused doubtless held back spirit forces not only from themselves but others. Doubts shut out the light. The gift of seeing is desirable. 'I was never blind and was surprised to learn that others did not see what I did." The power to see is in the spirit. Many manifestations were recorded in the scriptures, many in the night. People sometimes say in a questioning manner: 'It's strange these Spiritualists always have manifestations at night." But it is not thought necessary by them to ask why the stars are not seen in the daytime! Certain conditions are necessary to see these lights in the heavens. Why have dark seances half of the time? Yet nature makes its day half light and half dark. They are negative and positive conditions. The forces of nature balance themselves. Awake to the consciousness of the spirit of truth and life will be worth living. The world of material things is overshadowed by an intelligence and shall smooth and explain all things. Ask, then, and abide by the inspiration that appeals to your best understanding! All distress shall pass away because spirits shall come to help. I want to walk with you in love, that you may be clothed with the perfect garment of justice. Only when the soul has learned its full message to its other self does it meet its identity in the spirit world."

Secretary writes from Lynn, Mass.: "The Lynn Spiritualists Association will hold special services on May 18, in Cadet Hall, the occasion being a farewell concert to Prof. W. H. Thomas, by his friends, consisting of an orchestra of 15 pieces. The afternoon services will consist of an address by Miss Lizzie Harlow and the usual exercises followed by circles by Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs. Dr. Chase, Mrs. Litch, Mrs. Lewis, Madame Helyett, Mrs. Page and others. Supper will be served at 5 o'clock, followed by a song service, with Laura Metzger, pianist, and W. H. Atherly, cornetist. At 6:30 the orchestra will render many excellent selections; poem by Miss Harlow; notices by President Caird; lecture by Miss Harlow. The exercises will close with Sorosis, by W. H. Thomas. Mr. Thomas has served this society as cornetist and leader of the orchestra for five years, and leaves us to accept a position in Phinney's band of Chicago. We part with him with deep regret."

Nellie S. Baade writes from Wheeling, West Va.: "Since leaving Detroit a few months ago my experiences have been very interesting as I have noted the signs of the times. There is a constant demand for better educated and better developed speakers and mediums. It is a mistaken idea that any one is fitted to disseminate our philosophy simply because they can use words and only words. The time has arrived when Spiritualists demand the best we have to give, and for one we shall be glad when our instructors are wiser than the students they are endeavoring to teach. We believe that with the aid of the National and State associations, local societies through these instructions will discriminate and use better judgment than at any time in the past, for through experience we have all learned we must keep abreast of the times if we accomplish the desired results. At Columbus with their beautiful church, and an able and efficient corps of officers, a good choir and an able president, Mr. J. A. Arrass, they have everything in their favor to attract and build upon a solid foundation, and it was with sincere regret that I was obliged to leave them to fill other engagements. Coming here to Wheeling, I found them nicely situated, a beautiful hall centrally located, and a president who makes all feel welcome and at home. The society is composed of sincere, earnest souls, who with their money and influence for good are a decided success. I came here for May, but have been re-engaged for June. I also find many of the society are reading one of the best Spiritualist paper in the land. While here shall do all we can to interest the public in perusing our best Spiritual literature, and shall be pleased to take subscriptions for the dear old Progressive Thinker."

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, of Denver, Colo., has been suffering from another severe nervous attack, bringing on complete mental and physical prostration, due, the doctors say, to his psychic work. We are glad to learn, however, he is recovering and intends to continue to labor on psychic lines as he has done for the last quarter of a century or more. He hopes to reside in a lower altitude at an early date, probably going West.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

Words from the World of Spirits.

At the afternoon session of the mass meeting of Spiritualists at Buffalo, N. Y., Mrs. Tillie Reynolds gave a demonstration of her powers as a medium. In a few introductory remarks before she began delivering messages from the world of spirits she announced that she would speak through her favorite little Indian girl. Assuming a voice slightly childish, Mrs. Reynolds proceeded:

"Why cannot a Spiritualist give a full name or transmit messages more definitely from spirit to person?" she asked herself and then answered the question. "If our brains were perfect we would enjoy the power or full concentration and perhaps could transmit messages as accurately as a typewritist copies from her notes."

"Ah," she continued, shuddering as if going deeper into the trance, "I see a handsome looking gentleman, who just prior to his death must have been in the prime of physical condition. He is tall, broad-shouldered. He has a broad forehead denoting a keen intellect. It is evident that his mentality is that of a person who has the courage of his convictions. His eyes are keen and sharp. He appears as if he were always on the alert, yet is of a mild disposition. He comes to this woman on the second row here. Do you recognize the spirit, madam?"

The answer of the woman addressed was inaudible, but evidently she recognized it, or thought she did, for the medium continued to give a message from heaven. The message was:

"You have heeded me; I have heeded you. The days of our childhood, when we loved, are not over yet. We are still united by the bonds of Spiritualism that unite heaven and earth. I love you yet, and I know you love me."

Perhaps the most remarkable instance of Mrs. Reynolds' power, and surely the most convincing to the unbelieving, was the marvelous effect her words conveyed from the spiritual world had upon one of the pilgrims.

An old man, evidently a believer in Spiritualism for years, was seated well towards the rear of the Temple. His long white hair hung over his shoulders and made him noticeable in the crowd. Mrs. Reynolds proceeded deliberately down the aisle to where he sat. She grasped him by the hand and began talking. As she spoke he shuddered slightly—it was an uncanny shudder—at being brought in contact with a spirit. After she had spoken to some little length on general topics, she seemed to divulge something on which he had been waiting for a message, perhaps for years.

"Last spring," said she, "you did not expect to live until this spring. Your hopes were blighted. You have a purpose, an object to accomplish, concerning which you have not spoken a word to a mortal soul and——"

As if shocked by electricity the old man shuddered and shook violently. The effect her words had upon him was pronounced.

"Furthermore," she continued, "you will be spared and will live long enough to accomplish that secret purpose."

MESSAGE OF COMFORT.

The old man nestled down in his seat and gave a sigh of satisfaction. The message from the spirit world on that momentous question, whatever it was, had been comfort to him.

Noah and the ark, Adam and Eve and the Garden of Eden, Jonah and the whale, Samson and Delilah, were bodily dissected by W. H. Bach, of Lily Dale. Resorting to figures and fractions, he attempted to prove not that the Bible was not true, but that the stories mentioned were not literal, but figures of speech. Samson, with all his strength, was the sun, Delilah, the clouds. She bereft him of his power, not by clipping his locks, but by putting the sun under a cloud. The figures he used were exhaustive and proved to the satisfaction of the audience the absurdities of the stories literally taken.

Send us thirty words or more of your natural handwriting and ten cents in silver or stamps to cover cost of stenographic work, mailing, etc., and we will guarantee to give you a reading of your character and tell you what vocation nature intended you to follow to make the most money and secure the greatest amount of happiness.

Your whole life secret is revealed in your handwriting. Your special abilities and talents are plainly indicated. Some people get $18 a week salary when they should get $50. They are following the wrong vocation. It may be you are on the wrong track.

In addition to the reading of your character from your handwriting, we will send you, absolutely free, a beautifully illustrated copy of our new book, entitled "The Secret of Power," which fully explains the "Ki-Magi" System of Personal Influence, a new system of influencing and controlling people, which is guaranteed to make you successful in any business or profession. Hundreds of prominent business men, lawyers, doctors and ministers of the gospel are daily practicing the money-making secrets of this marvelous power.

"Your Ki-Magi System of Personal Influence has brought me that success in business for which I have been looking," writes Mr. S. I. Yetter, of Middletown, Pa. "It is the magnet that controls, there is no guesswork about it—it is a scientific fact. It has taught me to know and control myself as well as others."

Mr. W. Rockwell Kent, of Binghamton, N. Y., says: "Your Ki-Magi System is the most powerful agency on earth for the betterment of man. All who master it will become a power in the world and be successful and happy."

Our new system enables you to read the innermost secrets of a person's nature and to exert a powerful and irresistible influence over whomever you will without his knowledge. It is one hundred times more powerful and effective than hypnotism, threats, entreaties or anything else of this nature. It unfolds to you the secret of perfect health; it enables you to cure diseases without drugs or medicines and explains a new secret system of physical development by which you can attain perfect health and marvelous strength in one-tenth the time required by any other system of physical culture.

If you want to know for yourself the money-making secrets of our system, send your name and address to the Columbia Scientific Academy, Dept. 159T, 1931 Broadway, New York, N. Y., and our new book, together with the free reading of your handwriting by our eminent specialist, will be forwarded at once, postpaid.

"Spirit Echoes." By Mattie E. Hull. Many sweet thoughts illumine the pages of this volume of verse from the inspired brain and pen of Mattie E. Hull. It will be welcomed and treasured by many who have become acquainted with the author personally and through other of her published writings. It is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price 75c.

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood. Prof. Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents in succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. For sale at this office. Price, 25 cents.

"The Present Age and Inner Life; Ancient and Modern Mysteries Classified and Explained." By Andrew Jackson Davis. We have a few copies of this work by the celebrated seer. Cloth, $1.10.

"Three Jubilee Lectures." By J. M. Peebles, M. D. Doctor Peebles is a trenchant and instructive writer and lecturer, and these three addresses on the occasion of and pertinent to the Jubilee of Modern Spiritualism, are well worthy of being preserved in this tasty form, in print. Price, 35 cents. For sale at this office.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and well repaid by its perusal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1; paper, 50 cents.

"Elsie's Little Brother Tom," By Alwyn M. Thurber, is one of the best of books in the realm of stories for boys and girls, and not excepting older people. It is a fine birthday or holiday gift. Very interesting as well as instructive, and of good, refining influence. Price 75 cents. For sale at this office.

"Wedding Chimes." By Delpha Pearl Hughes. A tasty, beautiful and appropriate wedding souvenir. Contains marriage ceremony, marriage certificate, etc., with choice matter in poetry and prose. Specially designed for the use of the Spiritualist and Liberal ministry.

"The Life Booklets." By Ralph Waldo Trine. Three daintily beautiful little books, finely adapted for holiday presents. The titles are, "Character Building by Thought Power," "Every Living Creature," and "The Greatest Thing ever known." The matter is of high-toned spiritual character and of helpful purpose. Price 35 cents each, or $1.00 for the three.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH —OR— DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the keenest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Securely packed, and sent postage paid from the manufacturer, for $1.00. Address:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE,

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Farmer, Olena, N. Y.: Q. Is oleomargarine as healthful as butter?

A. As manufactured from deodorized and purified suet, lard and cotton-seed oil, oleomargarine has not only the almost exact composition of butter, it is much cleaner that most butter as made in private dairies. Butter gathered by country storekeepers, is often as unclean as offensive stables, and the absorption of the dust and odors of living rooms to which the milk is exposed can make it. It is true that this butter is "renovated" before offered for sale as "creamery stock," yet it remains that it would be difficult to find material for oleomargarine more offensive.

Oleomargarine is more palatable than butter, except the best grades. It is much cheaper. In 1900, 107,000,000 pounds were produced in the United states. It is impossible to make this vast amount good with butter. There are not cows enough, and it would be impracticable to greatly increase their number. The demand is rapidly becoming greater, and as it is already impractical to meet it with butter, other substances must be substituted. Man cannot live on bread alone. The starch must be mixed with some form of oil, for proper digestion and assimilation. In all countries some form is used. In Italy olive oil, or olives are eaten with the bread. Butter is as much a luxury as a necessity, and the making of oleomargarine as a substitute is a blessing. It should, like all other manufactures of food, be under government supervision, and be sold for just what it is, and not for butter. The tax placed upon it does not have the effect its framers designed, of preventing its competition with the products of the dairy, but enhances its price to consumers. It is as unjust as to place a tax on every pound of butter made.

It is not a question whether people shall eat butter or oleomargarine, but whether they shall have anything to take the place of butter, for without oleomargarine a great many would have neither. Hence the injustice of taxing this product, which only makes the consumers pay more, for the manufacturer adds the tax to the price.

Chas. H. Post: Q. Dewey began his battle in Manilla Harbor at early sunrise, May 1, 1898. What was the time of day at Washington, and day of week and month?

A. Manila time is 13 hours, 12 minutes and 5 seconds slow. If the hands of a clock were turned back that number of hours and minutes, beginning with six o'clock a. m., the correct time will be given. In other words it is 13 hours, 12 minutes and 5 seconds after the sun rises on the harbor of Manila before it appears on the horizon of Washington. When it is six in the morning at Manila, it is 4 o'clock, 48 minutes in the afternoon of the preceding day at Washington, or Sunday, May 1, is Saturday, April 30.

Truthseeker, Ashfield, Ont.: Q. (1) Is it a fact that there is such a dreadful place as this medium describes, and if so how are the poor creatures inhabiting it to work their way out?

(2) Do all have an opportunity to advance in the spirit world as soon as they desire to reform?

(3) Do the sufferings of a wicked man become intense as soon as death removes him to the spirit world?

A. (1) Such experiences must be taken as entirely symbolical. That those who are controlled by the lower faculties, by selfish and passional motives, suffer when they come to a realization of what they have lost, and the pain they have caused, is most true, but they do not have to go to any particular place to receive punishment.

To the mind receiving impressions of their condition the picture of scenery corresponding to the desolation of mind of such spirits, would arise, and perhaps this is the only way in which it can be given with sufficient intensity.

It is also true that spiritual beings of similar thoughts are attracted into groups and a barrier is thus raised against their receiving the light from the mission-angels who desire to approach them.

(2) There can be no advance in knowledge or in spiritual righteousness until there is a desire to do so, and with the desire comes immediate gratification.

(3) Death of itself brings slightest change in respect to how the past is regarded. Really the first step in progress is the one which brings most pain. Then it is sympathy is awakened and an others and itself by its errors. Thus it is it catches the reflection of the suffering it has caused; sensitive to the waves of reproach, hatred and grief it has provoked.

This may come when it awakes to the reality of a new life; it may come only after years, centuries, or ages of supine indifference.

Elsie Hornbeck. Q. In a reply to the question, "No one ever counted the year one," what authority is there then for dating Genesis, the first book of Moses, before Christ 4004? Am I to understand that there is absolutely no authority for the dates in the Bible?

A. This is exactly what is to be understood. This correspondent, like most readers of the Bible, appears to receive the dates printed on its margin as infallible. Instead, they are the guesswork of commentators. The Septuagint makes the date of the creation 6,000 years before Christ, a variance of 2,000 years. The highest authorities in the church and out of it, admit that there is nothing to fix the date of the creation as given in the so-called Books of Moses. The events recorded in the Bible have been assigned dates by comparing them with supposed contemporary events in "profane history." There is not a date in the original books. Every one has been supplied by priestly commutators, and as the data on which they rely are in most instances, assumed, and their methods misleading, the results are like those of a school boy who sets down his figures erroneously, blunders in his additions and guesses at the result.

As science has shown that the narrative of the creation is a myth; that there was no creation, and as it is admitted by Biblical scholars that no one knows who wrote the Books of Moses, or when they were written, to date time from the "creation of the world," is a transparent absurdity. And yet the dates appear on the margin of the Bible and are quoted, as though of absolute authority! This is a comedy of sacred history—a farce comedy.

G. R. Bicknell: A. J. Davis resides in Boston, where he has an extensive medical practice. The new edition of his works makes thirty volumes.

D. D. Home is now with those for whom he served as a most wonderful medium. He wrote his autobiography, Lights and Shadows of Spiritualism, and his wife has published a volume in which with loving pen she gives an account of his wonderful experiences.

Henry Slade is now at Battle Creek, Michigan, a physical wreck, and there has been an appeal sent out for assistance of those charitably disposed.

This correspondent asks: "Was the "Arcana of Nature" written in the same state that A. J. Davis gave Nature's Divine Revelations? The Arcana was among my earliest writings, and I wrote then both automatically and by impression, received in a state of more or less profound trance. All I have written for publication has been given me in this manner. From the beginning I have constantly referred the authorship to the spirit intelligences.

Mr. Davis began by being mesmerized, or hypnotized, for which he proved an excellent subject. He soon became independent of his operator, and passed into a condition of trance or clairvoyance which he called the "superior state." In this state he delivered the Nature's Divine Revelations, which a scribe wrote down as given.

After this he began to write the thoughts given him in that state, or by inspiration. If I rightly understand this great seer, the inspiring powers intensify his own spirit, exalt its capabilities into the "superior state" in which it has the perceptions of the emancipated spirits. That the spirit while in the body, may become in a measure free from its limitations, and acquire the perceptions of the spiritual state, is a well-established principle of psychic science. In that state it is sensitive to the control of spiritual beings, and from my own experience I affirm that it is difficult to determine where this influence from without begins, and the thoughts awakened in one's own spirit by this exaltation ends.

Island Lake Camp, Mich.

Island Lake is a body of pure, healthgiving water, one mile long and three-fourths of a mile wide, dotted with islands, hence its name. It is one of a group of which Briggs, Fonda and Dollar lakes are chief associates, Dollar Lake being connected with Island Lake by a canal, constructed by Mr. J. J. Van Leuven, whose summer home is in close proximity.

Island Lake camp grounds consist of eighteen acres of second growth groveland, chiefly white oak and hickory, situated upon the northwest side of Island Lake, about half-way between Lansing and Detroit on the Pere Marquette railroad. Upon these grounds the Island Lake Camp Association, has erected a hotel, auditorium, barns and other buildings for the successful management of a camp-meeting and summer resort.

For natural scenery, pure water, boating and fishing, bathing facilities, healthy climate, Island Lake camp ranks first among summer resorts in Michigan, and equal to any on the continent.

The Island Lake hotel is in fine sanitary condition, contains 45 well-equipped sleeping-rooms, large, airy dining-room and reception hall. It will be run this year by the Island Lake Camp Association, during camp season which commences July 27, and closes August 25. The programme contains such names as B. F. Austin, G. W. and Zaida B. Kates, Ben F. Hayden and Mrs. Hayden, Marguerite La Grange, Mrs. E. M. Moore, E. H. Chase and Mrs. McCoy. Programmes will be out in a few days giving particulars. There will be a Fourth of July celebration at Island Lake camp grounds. Milford band in attendance.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

MRS. BRITTEN ON ANIMALS AND THE FUTURE LIFE.

Question.—Animals have brains and nervous systems, and exhibit phenomena, mental, moral, and emotional, which seem to differ only in degree from those of human life; they think, they reason, and invent novel and ingenious methods of attaining their objects; they also manifest love, hatred, gratitude, revenge, joy, grief, jealousy, etc., and have methods of communication with each other. In our superior human nature, we regard these as manifestations of the spirit within us acting through the machinery of the brain and nervous system, and we know that spirit to survive the death of our mortal part. What is it that produces these analogous, though inferior, manifestations in the brute creation, and what becomes of it after death?

Answer.—The question presented requires us to define the difference between instinct and reason. Ranging from the lower order of animals to the highest, we find a gradual improvement in the complexity of the nervous system, which is the apparatus which thought traverses; it is the telegraphic wire upon which the life lightnings play, and without it the most magnificent and boundless scope of thought can never exhibit itself in matter. Consequently it is with especial reference to the nervous system as a physical cause that we must first attempt to answer your question.

We find that even the lowest orders of being exhibit a degree of instinct which is appropriate to their condition. All the creatures of the dry land or of the water possess instincts adapted to their state. Yet the amount of instinct thus exhibited has never yet been classed as reason. It is, then, between the mammalia, as the highest class of animals, and man, that we must endeavor to draw the chief distinction between instinct and reason; and the question assumes a still more subtle form when we remember that the highest order of mammalia possesses a nervous system almost equal to man. In them, too, we find the heart, with its arterial and venous apparatus for the distribution of the circulating fluids, as elaborately developed as in the human form. We find that the brain, although it differs in quality in different creatures, is almost as complex in its structure and convolutions as that of man; but we also find that the great column of the nervous system—the spine—with its ganglionic termination of the brain, is disposed differently in the animal to that of man. In the animal it runs laterally with the ground, and the brain receives the galvanic power of the solar ray at an angle which varies considerably from the direct or perpendicular. Man, on the contrary, in his erect position, receives the first direct impetus from the solar ray in the action of a horizontal beam; hence, whatever force the power of light and heat can exercise on receptive forms have in this attitude full scope for their exhibition, and must form a line of demarcation between the play of nervous force in the human and in the mammalia thus differently stimulated; and the next difference in degree of nervous force exhibited in form is found in the fact that no single form in creation is capable of exhibiting the same amount of intellectual power as man.

Whilst the eagle's wing can bear him upward to the sun the power of man can transcend the eagle's flight in the mechanical powers of mind displayed in the balloon. The mole can mine, the beaver build, the ant and bee manifest the united power of the geometrician and mathematician, the wasp's and the tarantula's nest are models of self-taught architecture; in short, throughout the whole range of natural history every creature manifests a peculiarity of instinct which antedates human inventions and emulates, in every form, the genius of man. But let it be remembered that these evidences of mental power are only exhibited in the lower creatures in one or two directions at a time. The manifestations of love, hatred, jealousy, revenge, provision and caution, all these are displayed in every species, but their exercise is limited within its species, and comprehends nothing outside of its own nature. I affirm that each one is not only adapted for the manifestation of the instinct it displays, but is as much compelled to exercise that instinct as the necessity of its form as the flower must needs give off peculiar fragrance and fruits or roots their quality of essence. It is far otherwise in the organism of man. This is mobile in every conceivable direction.

How various and infinitely stable are the instincts whose assemblage we call reason in man. Throughout the whole range of the human organism there is an adaptability to every circumstance, while the reason of man knits up into one all the fragments of intellectual power that are manifest in every other creature. Thus man is a spinner, weaver, builder, engineer and navigator. With the mariner's compass he is enabled to guide his course over the pathless waters of ocean better than the migratory instincts of even the swallow and the martin. By his intellect he is enabled to calculate atmospheric changes, and to determine even centuries hence what shall be the physical aspects of nature from what they now exhibit by the observation of the growth and formation of strata beneath his feet. There is not an element of mind or an atom of matter but what is distributed amongst the animal creation, but only in diverse forms and scattered fragments. Whilst, therefore, we find the parts of being divided in them; in man we behold them all combined as in creation's microcosm.

Then arises the question which I would feign elaborate more fully were there not so many other subjects of interest to consider. What shall become of this sovereign spirit of man, the totality of all other spiritual entities? And what of the fragments which constitute the life and instinct of the animal creation? Ask the realms of nature how she deals with the perfect and imperfect, the parts and whole of being? Then we find that whatsoever is perfect is preserved, while imperfection pays sin's wages—death, and passes as a fragment into higher forms to constitute a whole. Hence, while every animal is perfect in its degree, it is not perfect in relation to the highest form, which is man. It is only perfect as regards its own peculiar state and sphere. Here on earth its being is necessary, its place is marked; but man, to whom the earth and all things of it are subjects, transcends the earth, and therefore belongs to spheres higher than the earth. It is sometimes claimed at the spirit circle that all the forms known in the animal kingdom are found in the spirit spheres.

And this is true of some spheres which contain all types of earth, and which preserve the representation of every condition manifested here, from the lowest mollusca to the highest man. You can annihilate nothing; therefore, you cannot annihilate the fragments of thought which vitalize and move the very humblest forms; but such forms are not preserved in permanent immortality, because they are not perfect, nor susceptible of continuing an individualized existence any longer than the form which it occupies is useful to creation; therefore, though for a time in the eternal progress of things the animal forms are preserved in something like a spiritual representative shape, these at last become extinct.

Even as the monsters which are no longer useful to the earth's surface have now become extinct and passed away, so for a time in the lower spheres you will find the representative forms of animals preserved, but not in the higher. There, where the perfected spirit of man dwells, there is no consociation with animal forms whatsoever. We claim that the animal spirit, then, has a continued but not an immortal existence, whilst the spirit of man as a perfect elaboration of form and intellect, the cosmos that binds up all of existence known or conceived of in the universal mind—this remains forever.

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

A CASE IN POINT.

Our friends on the other side of the road who prefer to be Psychical Researchers rather than Spiritualists never tire of telling us that Suggestion or Telepathy, sufficiently stretched, will explain all the "spirit messages" upon which any of us have relied. All we have to do is to admit the reality of mental suggestion, and to give it unbounded scope, being careful, however, to limit its action to people still in the flesh. Thus, supposing we are told, at a seance, that Sigismund Osterhagen, a name we have never heard, is present, that he lived thirty years ago in Bavaria, and died twenty years ago in South Africa, where, acting as a German colonist or explorer, and that, if we inquire at a certain village in Bavaria where his brother lives, we can verify his statements, we are informed that this is quite useless as indicating a spirit message, because the suggestion may proceed from the brain of that very brother and be mistaken by us, or mis-rendered by us, as a communication from a "spirit."

It is in vain we urge that no person present could by any possibility know anything either of Sigismund or his brother, and that Bavaria is many hundreds of miles away. We are gravely told that suggestions, like microbes, travel without restraint, and that they may alight and influence anywhere. So long, in fact, as the information given can be even imagined to be in any physically encased mind on the planet, spirit action is ruled out. Virtually, this is saying that suggestion from the unseen is incapable of proof, inasmuch as one can never be sure, absolutely sure, that the particulars of a given 'message' were not known to any incarnate mind. But there are degrees, anyhow; and there are probabilities that almost amount to certainties; and we are persuaded that these are sufficiently numerous to warrant us treating the demand of the typical Psychical Researcher as not only unreasonable but aggravating.

Here, however, is a case in point. The Rev. M. J. Savage, D. D., is known all over America as one of its most accomplished and honest ministers; an experienced man of the world, a scientific thinker, a bold but cautious investigator, and a robust-minded man. For several years he has felt it to be his duty to look into the claims of Spiritualism. Some thought him slow; others feared he was too ready to go on; but again and again his serious statements attracted attention from both extremes, and there has been the usual risking of influence and position. These statements seem to have culminated in the impressive article in "Ainslee's Magazine" from which we lately quoted. We refer to the touching little story referring to his son. Let us, for a moment, recall the leading points of it. Dr. Savage, though an experienced investigator, had not been in the habit of attempting to get into communication with any particular spirit; but, on this occasion, some one or some thing professing to be his son anxiously made a request. He was urged to go to his deceased son's lodgings, to find there certain papers and to at once destroy them. "He would not be satisfied," says Dr. Savage, "until I had promised to do this." He went as he had promised, found the papers, and "at once saw the meaning and importance of what he had asked me to do." And yet the medium had no personal acquaintance with his son, and had probably never seen him. "I submit," says Dr. Savage, "that this reference to loose notes and papers which, for some unknown reason, he was anxious to have destroyed is something which would be beyond the range of guesswork."

We respectfully invite the attention of all types of Psychical Researchers to that statement. Lying is out of the question. Deception of any kind is practically excluded. The fact in question appears to have been known to one person only, the deceased; the secret "died" with the so-called "dead;" and yet here it comes wafted out from the unseen with every indication of knowledge and discrimination. There does not seem to be any room for suggestion or telepathy from any incarnate mind; —and we must remember that in cases of this kind the evidence is rapidly cumulative, that is to say the evidential value of the repetition of such cases very rapidly reaches practical certainty.

What we submit is that Dr. Savage's conclusion is both more reasonable and more simple than the explanation we cited at the outset. It is to truth much more likely that an unseen person could influence a mind to think or a hand to write than that a disembodied thought or anxiety could go wandering about until it impinged upon some person's brain. One can hardly imagine anything more grotesque and unbelievable than that. At any rate, the hypothesis of an active disembodied spirit is simplicity itself in comparison.

The most elementary notion of what death really is might make this clear to anyone. The real self, of course, is not flesh and blood; and even if we persist in the belief that there is no personality without embodiment, it is the easiest thing imaginable to postulate for the spirit self a body, intangible and invisible, but not less real on that account. And what more reasonable than that a being so equipped might easily enough float suggestions from the unseen? No; the really surprising thing is that such suggestions are not obvious all along. We say "obvious" purposely, reserving the opinion that they may be none the less real and constant. Emerson, writing of Fate or Jove, or, let us say, God, says:

Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line
Severing right from wrong,
Spin the bowl, but leave the poles
Love and Hate to throng.

Bring the stuff, the plot is mine,
Rule and Reason, Choice and Chance,
Planted in man's power and will,
Betraying weakness from his frame.
Which is human, which divine.

And that might possibly be wisely said to humanity of the spirit world in which we live and move and have our being.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

Some Beautiful Experiences Told.

To the Editor:—I thought perhaps some of your readers might be interested to hear some of my experiences along the lines of Spiritualism. I have tested the subject thoroughly, and positively know without any doubts whatever, that people and animals do live on after the body is dead. I had a long and varied experience with the planchette, manipulated by a young boy, and I cannot begin to tell you the many and wonderful communications received from friends, as it would fill a volume. My husband, mother, and others, wrote messages, which I instantly recognized as their own handwriting, and about things no one knew of but myself, and did all they could to convince me of the reality of spirit return.

While I was in San Francisco I met a great many mediums (and I believe there are more Spiritualists there than in any other place in the United States) but found no frauds. I was a perfect stranger to them all, yet received the most wonderful tests. Uncommon names were given, of relatives and others—messages which came true.

A medium by the name of Kotter took my photo, and eleven faces appeared on the plate with mine, all of whom I recognized. Those who passed away in early life looked more mature. My beautiful guardian spirit (an aunt) so often described by mediums, and some others, had white veils thrown over their faces which almost glistened, and were all very natural pictures. Will the brilliant Jamieson explain all this, or cease calling it all a fraud? A message came for me to sit alone in my room and talk. They would hear, as the sound vibrates on the atmosphere. I did so, and after a time, heard constantly a ringing or as though some one was blowing in my inner ear, until I heard distinctly their voices, and it is just wonderful how natural they sound and how strong I feel their presence. They told me when a brother was about to pass away, and it came true. They tell me they impress one when asleep, and if I have a vivid dream it means something. Once I dreamed I saw a coffin standing upright in the distance, and an open grave, and mother standing near. I asked, "Whose coffin is it?" when she replied, "It's for some one belonging to you. Will is sick, and in a few months, will be with us." He was my son, to whom I hastened, as I had not heard from him, and found him quite ill. As several months passed, and he grew weaker, often remarking, "It's so hard to part," I began to talk to him of the grand, glorious Spiritual philosophy, and who had promised to meet him. He listened for the first time and said, "Mother, do you know this is true?"

I replied, "I know it as well as I know I am talking to you." A few days after, he was sleeping, and I sat watching him, when I fell partly asleep—half unconscious for a time. I soon heard his gentle laugh and voice saying, "Mother's right! I'm delighted," which roused me, when I saw that he had passed out of the body.

I am never lonely, for some of the dear spirits are with me all the time, and their descriptions of the spirit land tallies well with what has been written about it. They have their homes, and progress as the amount of good they do. Goodness, love and wisdom are the main attributes towards progression. When I speak of some one being wicked, they tell me such ones will be left out of the spiritual world, and that it is part of their work to help redeem them and they try in every way to influence us to a higher life, if we will yield to their influences, though they say the way is open for bad spirits to return to earth, yet it rests with us whether we take them into our hearts or not, same as it does to welcome good or bad people to our homes. They also tell me, no spirit which has left the body ever returns to earth, to live in another body.

I was brought up strictly orthodox, as most of my friends on earth are, and they all condemn me for believing the truth; will not hear one word about it. In all my travels I find people are drifting towards Spiritualism, thinking for themselves, searching for the truth, more than any other way, and the outlook is fine. Nothing can make one so happy, or contented with this life or ready to die, as the glorious truths of Spiritualism. M. R. J.

THE GOLDEN JUBILEE.

Dedicated to the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, Pa.

PROLOGUE.

In eighteen hundred and fifty-two,
When foes were many and friends were few,
A band of workers small and true
Arose, a noble work to do.
With brain and with might,
For truth and the right,
They founded this temple to stand,
A monument tall,
Of freedom to all;
A beacon light over the land.

Just fifty years ago to-day,
A few whose creeds were brushed away,
Arose from twilight's dusky grey
To give their pent up spirits sway,
And give to the earth
A holier worth
By blending it with spirit sphere;
By adding a thought
To messages brought
From kindred and friends ever dear.

TOAST.

Here's to the life of those old pioneers!
Here's to those heroes who buried their fears
Be noble and proud
And cheer them aloud,
For founding this temple to be
The home of the true.
Oh, here's to the few
Old heroes, a Glad Jubilee!

Here's to the world illumined and bright!
Here's to the cause
Of Nature's grand laws!
Here's to our well-earned liberty!
Here's to the band
Still at "the old stand!"
Here's to this time of Glad Jubilee!

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,
Is Now Located at

No. 1087 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading symptom.

THE LAWS OF LIFE.

As Measured by Spiritual and Material Standards.

Legislation has been trying for ages to compel mankind to recognize certain ideals and materialize them in their religious, social and political life; and in the form of legislative enactments which have made it mandatory with punishment for their violation. But it always has been and always will be a truthful saying that, "convince a man against his will, and he is of the same opinion still." It is a fact plainly to be observed that where the spiritual law is dominant, in that proportion there is less necessity for a manifestation of its power externally.

The material laws as seen by the enactments placed upon the statutes of those different associations of human beings called governmental systems, whether monarchial or republican, are largely of a repressive nature; they have sought to compel mankind to conform to certain systems, in their dealings with each other. It says to Jones, "If you infringe upon any of the rights of Brown, the law will punish you." But Jones replies: "Whether there is a law or not upon the statute books dealing with that question, and calling for punishment because of an infringement upon another's rights, I would not do such an act."

Why? Because he has the spiritual law dominant in his life, making him entirely independent of its material manifestation. As far as he is concerned legislative enactments bearing upon that question are a waste of time and are null and void as far as having any influence on his life.

To say that all prohibitive legislation has been without any good results would be making a statement that is not founded upon the truth. Human life in its efforts to advance has had to struggle upward through a dense mass of ignorance and brutality; self-defence has been the cause of certain laws being enacted which would not be needed under a higher type of development; but in proportion that the higher faculties have become dominant, it has strove to suppress the lower. The theory which is acted upon is, that punishment must be inflicted upon those who violate the letter or spirit of the law; but as the spiritual law is more perfectly understood, punishment for its violation is superseded by the doctrine of reformation.

Through the mistakes that have been made in the enactment of repressive legislation, knowledge of the truth has been gained that it at best can only be a means to bring about a certain end needful only because of the lack of ability in those to understand anything higher. That end to be the education of that type of development to where it could understand the higher law and obey it not from fear of punishment, but because in its outward manifestation it was but the reflection of its internal power over their lives.

Only a small proportion of human society have evolved far enough so as to be capable of being a law unto themselves; being in such perfect accord with that spiritual power that all the other forms in which it is represented could be set aside. In making a comparison between the material and spiritual law as it affects human life, it is grandly inspiring to have a high ideal of what it is possible for it to attain unto; it is the beautiful vision, and Utopia if the people would so wish. Taking the most advanced nations of the world as the standard of measurement, those ideals are at best only dress suits to be worn on special occasions. In dealing with the problems of life it is as necessary to consider the facts of the case as they are at present as well as to try to consider what they probably will be; nevertheless keeping in sight that ideal which must always be in advance of the real.

The mighty efforts that are being made to hold in check those forces which, if not controlled, would dominate the world by their aggressiveness and utter disregard for the rights of those who may oppose their ambitious schemes, has borne some good fruit.

It is an inherent right that human society has to hold such forces in subjection; that they must respect the legitimate rights of others and any violation of the law established for protection against the aggressions will be followed by punishment to the full extent of the law. The question may be asked, is that the course of action in accordance with the spiritual law? The correct answer will be that it is, because that is the proportion that the forces which are being dealt with are capable of understanding that law. The child in the kindergarten must have its lessons graded according to its ability to understand them, and at the same time hold to the fact that the kindergarten is not the ultimatum, but the beginning of a course that will eventually develop its mental faculties, bringing them to a position where they can understand problems superior to those with which it was the province of the primary department to deal.

In dealing with the problems of human life, viewing it from the actual position that it is occupying at the present time, rather than from the one that we know will ultimately be attained, we see that human society has not yet advanced unto that position where it can dispense with the external manifestations of the law. It is yet needed in the dealing with the crude forces of human life. When the higher law cannot be understood it must be made manifest in a manner so that it can be.

The constitution of the United States is supposed to represent the supreme law of the republic, and all legislation that is not in accord with it is null and void. That supreme law says congress shall not make any law defining the religious views of the citizens of the republic; that is a question which must be decided by each individual for themselves, no other having any right to interfere. The knowledge gained by viewing the history of those nations which undertook coercive measures to suppress liberty of conscience convinced the framers of that document that it was necessary to materialize that law so that those who might seek to infringe upon human liberty could be more effectually held in check. The material manifestation and enforcement of those laws which pertain to the all-important subject of the guarding of the inherent rights of society against the encroachments of antagonistic forces is evidence that the association of individuals composing the nation or race for which they were intended has not as a whole evoluted up to that state of spiritual development where they have the internal law so perfected in their lives that they can dispense with the external form.

The obnoxious and oppressive legislation which has been enacted at different times, and whose only object was to prevent other fellow-beings from enjoying the benefits of freedom in their religious, social and political life, has developed a school of thinkers whose battle cry is, opposition to all legislation; seeing only the dark side of the matter the beneficent efforts made and its results are condemned the same as the malignant ones. The theory of dispensing with all of the external forms of legislation is all right in the proportion that the nation or race is capable of substituting the higher law for the lower, and able to act it out in practical life.

Admitting the wrong that has been done through legislation that sought to destroy human liberty, and that made the struggle for advancement more violent because the forces that should have been used as a help had become antagonistic. Nevertheless, where would have been our present phase of civilization, which, with all of its infirmities, is an advance over its past recorded history? The battle that has been waged in the effort to drive back the powers of darkness has been productive of some good results, and by the help of beneficent legislation it has held in check those demoniac forces which sought to become dominant.

That it could have advanced to its present state without that powerful helper is doubtful. It occupies the same position in the moral and spiritual world that the powerful explosives do in the subduing of the physical. Their destructive energies can be made to work in a manner that is helpful by removing conditions that could not otherwise be reached and which were obstacles to advancement, as well as their being used to destroy what had already been attained. It depending entirely with both in what manner they are used when classifying them as helpers or obstacles. The external manifestation of the laws of life should be in a manner that would assist in the removal or at the least help to bring under control those conditions that if left would prove destructive to the growth that had already been made.

When the time comes that the more spiritual form of the laws of life can be given expression in human society, that will be evidence of the strongest kind that it has developed up to a state where it can understand and appreciate that higher law. It must first earn a right to that condition of life before it can be received. The law of the forces that dominate the spiritual world is that something cannot be received from nothing; there must be an equivalent returned and that has been given in the onerous, persistent efforts that have been and are being made by humanity to more fully understand the divine forces inherent in their own lives, but which are yet dormant and can only be infused with the power of that higher law by an incessant struggle for its attainment. That wonderful spiritual vision which was seen by the revelator interprets the condition of human life. That mighty host which "had come up out of deep tribulation" were those who had evolved from out of the crude material a more perfect life, who had made the spiritual law the dominant factor so that it superseded all of the lower forms in which it had been manifest to them.

The maxim is a true one that "experience is a hard school but fools will learn in no other." The efforts that are being made, the successes and failures recorded, have given an experience which could not have been acquired in any other manner. Human life is being taught that it is impossible to get without the domain of law. The confusion that many times arises is the result of its misinterpretation, inability to understand its proper method of operation; when the spiritual law should be enacted, trying to misplace it and substitute the lower forms. Experience comes slowly, but as it is acquired the more crude systems are cast aside and life comes into harmony with that condition which enables it to be a law unto itself, free from the bondage to its external forms. The basis of what we term civilization in contradistinction of the more barbarous systems is not merely in the ability to understand and use the material forces of the universe; for without the development of the spiritual faculties in human life enabling it to more perfectly understand the higher law and manifest it in all of the phases of life, power to use these material forces without that corresponding development of the spiritual faculties would result in greater harm to the race than good. It would be like placing some one in charge of an intricate machine who was entirely ignorant of its construction and manipulation. There would be confusion with the probable destruction of the machine. That is what has resulted when mankind has tried to control forces the nature of which they were ignorant. It was what caused the destruction of the ancient civilizations. An understanding of the spiritual law did not correspond with its material manifestations; and the result of that lack was a congestion of the energies of life which culminated in the overthrowal of the system on which they were founded.

The same condition confronts our modern civilization. It is becoming congested by excessive legislation, and the same results will accrue to it that overtook its ancient namesake; unless there is an elimination of that effete matter which if not removed will produce a burden too heavy for it to carry and it will go down under the load. When the spiritual law comes to fully control human society the violent and spasmodic efforts that at present are being made to control those gigantic combinations of capital called trusts, will not be necessary, because the selfish desire to use the power that is possessed for the aggrandizement of the few will be dominated by the desire to benefit the whole.

But that is the ideal state; the actual is called upon to contend with forces that must be brought into subjection and used as a means to advance the great body of human society or else be dominated by them to the overthrowal of the spirit if not the letter of the law which announces that it is a self-evident fact that all are created free and equal, with a right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

To deny the right of human society to battle against those malignant forces would be wrong on the very face of it. Those conditions must be met and an effort made to control them, and the only true course to pursue is, that if at first you don't succeed, try again. That the spiritual law will eventually assume the supremacy we do not doubt. Its mission is to lead mankind upward to that condition where they can in reality have the spiritual law the controlling power of their existence, so that the declaration of independence against its lower forms will be a fact and not a mere idle formula of words. The terrific struggles that have been made and will continue until the race is emancipated from its thraldom to the lower law and brought up to a standard where where it cannot be said of either the religions or politics of the world, what awful crimes are committed in thy name, and where liberty will be what its name implies, freedom from all of the systems that are holding human life in bondage, and that the spiritual laws of life will not be to the great body of humanity merely a beautiful vision and ideal but a condition actualized in its life.

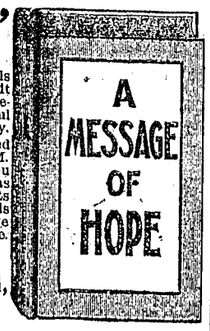
HEALTH RESTORED

The entire country is astonished at the wonderful cures perfected through the method originated by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Mich. This science is a subtle force in nature combined with magnetic medicines, and called by the eminent doctor,



Psychic Science

It has been termed the greatest pain reliever ever known. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system and restores health. It makes no difference how serious or hopeless the case may seem, there is positive hope in this grand science. It has restored the deaf, blind and lame, cured the paralytic, and those suffering from Bright's Disease, Consumption, Stomach Trouble, Catarrh, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Female Troubles, as well as men and women addicted to the liquor, morphine and other vile habits.

Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two month's treatment writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

written by Dr. J. M. Peebles, in a plain and concise manner, tells you exactly how and where you can gain perfect health; in fact, it gives you the key to the grandest knowledge known to man. Remember, this book costs you nothing, and it reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday realities of to-day.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and address and leading symptoms to Dr. J. M. Peebles and his associates and you will receive full diagnosis without any cost whatever, as well as this grand book, which is beautifully illustrated, rich in all its details, containing matter which will be a revelation to you. It is a token which any one may be proud of. Write to-day and receive "A Message of Hope" and diagnosis of your case absolutely free. Address

Dept. AA, BATTLE CREEK, MICH.

Mrs. Abigail Walker, an old subscriber of The Progressive Thinker, passed to the higher life at Forest River, N. D. April 27, 1902, aged 72 years and 5 days. "A beautiful life ends not in death," and so the life of our blessed mother is only begun. She was a devout Spiritualist, her religion to do whatsoever her hands found to do. We feel we have lost, in bodily form, an unselfish mother and truest friend, and though we know there is no death, yet do we mourn for her, for she was ever ready to help us bear our burdens.

HER LOVING DAUGHTERS.

Passed to spirit life, Jan. 22, 1902, my daughter, Mary, in the 29th year of her earth life. After arranging all of her worldly affairs to her satisfaction, and bidding her friends in cheerful good-bye, and promising the doctor and me that if it were possible she would communicate to us sometime, she passed away like one going to sleep, without a struggle.

BOOK REVIEW.

The animus of this book is well expressed in these quotations from the preface:

"My plea is for justice and equality in all the relations of life between men and women."

"Infinite law makes no discriminations; women excel and men excel each in her or his sphere; as equals, they make a little world of their own, where love instead of appetite, passion and selfishness rule."

It is issued in two styles of binding: Leatherette, 50c.; stiff boards, 75c.

A Mine of Valuable Reflections and Suggestions.

This work was automatically transcribed by George A. Fuller, M. D., a gentleman who stands high as a lecturer and medium. It is a mine of valuable reflections and suggestions. The paragraphs are short, suggestive and inspiring. Every one of them leads to something higher, grander, nobler. Price $1.00.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

APPEALS TO METHODISTS.

A short discourse by Spirit Bishop Haven, given automatically through the hand of Carrie E. S. Twing. Price, 20c.

HEALING, Causes and Effects, By W. P. Phelon, M. D. Deals with the finer mental and spiritual forces as applied to healing. Price, 50 cents.

A NEW CATECHISM,

BY M. M. MAGASARIAN.

This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book of reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND Other Offerings.

BY

EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

This volume contains a selection of the best poems of this gifted author and storiettes contributed by Clair Tuttle in her charming style. There are 285 pages, with six full-page illustrations, including photogravures of the author and Clair Tuttle. It is bound in blue with aluminum embossing. Many of the poems are especially adapted for recitations.

The Author needs no introduction to the spiritual public. Her songs are among the best in spiritual literature. Epes Sargent said of one of her poems that it was the equal of anything in the language, and that she was the poet of the New Dispensation.

The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."

That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."

Will Carlton: "I have read with great interest."

Sarah Thorpe Thomas, the Humanitarian says: "A most exquisite bouquet * * * * the thoughts echo and re-echo through the deepest recesses of my heart. I have some word of praise for every page."

The author says in the dedication: "To those whose thoughts and longings reach into the unseen Land of Souls, this handful of asphodels, mixed with common flowers, is offered, hoping to give rest and pleasure while waiting at the way stations on the journey thither."

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful num- Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

LIGHT OF EGYPT.

The Second Volume of a Most Valuable Work.

This is the author's posthumous work left in MS. to a few of his private pupils in occultism, and like Volume I. is (a valuable addition and) a library on occult subjects. Spiritual astrology is especially elaborated. Alchemy, Talismans, the Magic Wand, Symbolism, Correspondence, Penetralia, etc., are a few of the subjects treated of in a scholarly and masterly manner, showing the author to be familiar with his subjects. You cannot afford to be without it, as well as all his other books, viz.: The Light of Egypt, Vol. I., bound in cloth, $2; paper, $1. The Light of Egypt, Vol. II., bound in cloth only, $2. Celestial Dynamics, cloth, $1. The Language of the Stars, paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

Talleurand's Letter to the Pope.
This work will be found especially interesting to all who would desire to make a study of Romanism and the Bible. The historic facts stated, and the keen, scathing review of Romish ideas and practices should be read by all. Price 25 cents.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 24, 1902. NO. 652.

A PLAIN RE-STATEMENT OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

Christian Science had lately a rather staggering exemplification in the person of one of its noted and able exponents. As stated by the New Orleans Times-Democrat,

"There are several hundred more people in the city of New Orleans who are much further beyond the reach of the teachings and power of Christian Science to-day than there were at dinner time last night. The additional hundreds who are now immune, constituted the audience that assembled in the Y. M. C. A. hall last night, to hear ex-Judge William G. Ewing, of Chicago, explain the real significance of Christian Science. The reason that the members of the audience are now cured of any hankering for the strange cult is that Judge Ewing collapsed from an attack of real old-fashioned heart-failure before he had more than just entered into the discussion of the subject.

"He had barely finished the opening sentences of his lecture, when his voice became indistinct, and as he continued it became huskier and less in volume. Over his face there came a deathly palor and great drops of perspiration stood out on his forehead. He looked around and beckoned to Philip Gensler, Jr., the gentleman who introduced him, to hand him a glass of water. Mr. Gensler apparently did not see the motion, and the desperately sick man gamely tried to go on with his talk. By that time his words could only be heard by those who sat in the front row of the auditorium.

"His last distinguishable words were: 'But, ladies and gentlemen, I do not care to discuss these questions further with you this evening.'

"By the greatest effort of his will he was able to turn and take a little of the water that was handed to him, and then staggering and limp, he tottered off the stage in the arms of Mr. Gensler.

"To say that the audience was electrified would be putting it very mildly. The out-and-out Christian Scientists apparently were momentarily paralyzed, and the others, while deeply sympathetic with Judge Ewing, were inclined to laugh a little at the spectacle of a leader of the cult, afflicted with plebian heart failure, which is unquestionably an ill of the flesh, right before their eyes.

"'What a pity,' was the general comment.

"Judge Ewing was seen in the anteroom and was unable to raise his head from the back of a chair, over which he was leaning. His face was covered with perspiration, and he was weak and trembling.

"'Was it just a sudden shock, Judge?' asked a representative of the Times-Democrat.

"Before the stricken jurist could answer several of the attendants hustled the reporter away and left the solution of a very interesting question forever in doubt. The persons who attended the lecture are wondering how the tenets of Christian Science can be reconciled with the palpable physical illness of the great apostle of the cult."

The influence of mind in conserving health and overcoming diseased conditions of one's physical system may be freely acknowledged, especially by those who have intelligently studied the subject and the principles of what is known as "Suggestion" and "Auto-suggestion."

But a knowledge and acknowledgment of this fact does not necessarily imply that the assumptions of Mrs. Eddy are truths beyond dispute, as they are held by her disciples and followers.

There is a truth in Christian Science—so-called—which may be freely admitted, without going to the extent of asserting one's belief in what one knows by the evidence of his senses to be a falsehood.

Really there seems to be much basis for the assertion that it is a cardinal principle with the confirmed Christian Scientist to lie—to declare as fact what said Scientist knows is false.

The system, as a "science," bears resemblance to the principle of lying to one's self, or to others, in order to cure one's own, or others' disease or sickness.

It is an attempt to cheat one's own consciousness by persistently claiming to be "well" when one knows he is "sick."

Or, perhaps it might be said, on T. Jay Hudson's hypothesis, one's "objective mind" was attempting to trick his "subjective mind," by suggesting that "all is spirit, there is no sickness," etc.

To show the absurdity of the Eddy doctrine, let us see how it will appear when stated in the form of a syllogism:

Matter has no existence. Our bodies are composed of matter. Therefore our bodies have no existence.

Hence, of course, disease cannot exist in a non-existent body. Such is the logic of Christian Science.

One of the leading teachers of the "science," in a published book, directs the patient to affirm that "all is spirit," "there is no matter," etc.

All right; agreed. Now here is a man with a big, deep, ulcerous carbuncle on his neck. Now: "All is spirit," "there is no matter." Well, what is the result?

If all is spirit, and there is no matter, then there is a "spirit" suffering with a big painful spirit carbuncle; and the pain is none the less acute because it is a spirit pain, from a spirit carbuncle, on a spirit neck.

"All is spirit," hence the human body is spirit, and then the child with diphtheria must be a spirit afflicted with spirit diphtheria, and when the child dies under Christian Science treatment a "spirit" dies. Of course—if "all is spirit" and "there is no matter."

Here is a man whose nose has been wholly eaten away by a malignant cancer, during which process, extending over several years, he has suffered excruciating pain.

But "all is spirit," "there is no matter." Of course, then, it is a spirit nose, afflicted with a spirit cancer, and so forth.

But how effect a cure? Why, this man whose nose is eaten away, and the cancer gnawing deeper still, must maintain that he is not sick at all, that it is all an illusion of the mortal mind, without reality; he must affirm that he is well, and by this affirmation and belief he will be well.

Says Mrs. Eddy: "Mentally contradict every complaint from the body, and hold your ground disputatiously until the body yields to your demand." In other words: Lie and stick to it, though you know you are lying. That is the sum and substance of the Christian Science system of healing.

It was James Gordon Bennett who was credited with the saying: "A lie well stuck to is as good as the truth."

The Eddy "scientists" seem to have been grounded on this basic principle in their method of healing. The principle is just this: Whatever your ailment, just lie about it, and stick to your lie until you believe it, and you will be well—and give the glory of your cure to Mrs. Eddy and the wonderful Christian Science that came straight down to her from heaven.

But, alas, sometimes the plan fails to effect a cure. Then, of course, there must be a reason for the failure; and it is found, as with the Dowie failures in like cases, in "lack of faith." You must not only persistently assert that you are not sick, but you must believe what you assert.

The logic of it is, you must lie and stick to it, and keep on lying until you believe your lie is truth.

Then, if you get well—great is Mrs. Eddy and Christian Science. If you die—why, since "there is no matter," it will be "no matter."

Another anomaly which presents a problem that cannot be solved on lines of common sense, nor by anything aside from the peculiar logic of Christian Science, is this: The Christian Scientist utterly decries the use of drugs; then declares there is no matter, all is spirit. Of course, then, drugs are spirit, and the giving of drugs is purely spirit medication. This is the logical sequence of their own philosophy. But if drugs are spirit, and spirit is God, and God is good—why object to drug medication?

There is really no conclusive evidence to prove that the cures effected by Christian Science healers are the result of any force or power other than "suggestion." Suggestion may be embodied in a literal lie. "Regular" physicians act upon this principle when they administer bread pills to their patients; the suggestion to the patient's mind is that he is taking a medicine that will do him good—and it does. The suggestion to the Christian Science patient is, that the formulas of lying asseverations taught by that "science," which might be called the science of lying for health, will result in health—and sometimes, as a result of suggestion, it does.

The power of thought, suggestion, is indeed very great, and the effect may be the same, whether the thing said be true or false. Very bad news concerning one's own interests, or concerning a very dear friend or relative may so shock a sensitive person as to cause fainting and even death; and this, though the news turns out to be untrue. Its truth or falsity cuts no figure, if only it be believed to be true. The same principle applies to Christian Science and its results; the truth or falsity cuts no figure, if only it is believed to be true. Hence the fact of healing occurring under Christian Science methods does not prove that the theories and assumptions of the Christian Scientists are true, or that their philosophy of healing is correct. Their healings are all explainable on the experimentally proved theory of "suggestion" and "auto-suggestion."

The questionable ethics of "Christian Science" deserves some attention. In view of the methods of healing—by persistently asserting as a fact what one knows to be false, the Science might well be said to be ethics reversed.

But there are other considerations that may well incline a judicial mind to take a lenient view. No one will deny that very many—perhaps most Christian Scientists are persons of high moral character. What, then, is the explanation of the seeming inconsistency between their character and their teachings?

Look at the notorious Dowie and his following. A man of strong hypnotic power, he has brought thousands under his sway, so that they fear to incur his displeasure, and are ready to obey when he commands them to pour money into the treasury of "Zion."

And so of Christian Scientists, hypnotized, "suggested" or "auto-suggested" into believing in Mrs. Eddy and her teachings—including "all is spirit," "there is no matter;" "sickness is unreal," a mere "illusion of the mortal mind;" "dispute the testimony of the senses by divine science;" "mentally contradict every complaint from the body, and hold your ground disputatiously until the body yields to your demand."

What she means by "the body," where "all is spirit," "there is no matter," is a conundrum to ordinary common-sense minds.

But her disciples yield assent to her teachings, and believe the same to be true—hypnotized, suggested or auto-suggested into this belief—in things that contradict the testimony of their senses.

Charles Wesley wrote in one of his hymns:

"Faith, mighty faith the promise sees,
And looks to that alone,
Laughs at impossibilities,
And cries: It shall be done."

The Christian Science disciples of Mrs. Eddy, under the influence of her teachings, seem to be possessed with an exaggerated form of the same idea, and not only "laugh at impossibilities," but carry the principle to the extent of believing—having faith—that that is true which the whole testimony of their senses declares is false. There may be "Christian Science" in this, but it is not scientific science, and runs counter to common sense, logic and ethics. Where is the sense or science, for instance, of a "Christian Science" lady, afflicted with a painful "running" sore on or near her ankle, persisting for a year or more in the "Christian Science" treatment, declaring she is well, she cannot be sick, she has no pain—"all is spirit," "there is no matter," "dispute the testimony of the senses by divine science," "mentally contradict every complaint from the body, and hold your ground disputatiously," etc., etc.,—and all the while growing worse. Such a case occurred here in Chicago.

The fact is, such cures as are effected under "Christian Science" treatment are wrought under and by the principle of Mental Science, and the Christian Scientists do not understand the real principle by which their supposed Christian Science cures are effected.

Mental Science therapeutics rests on a stable philosophic and scientific basis; its advocates and practitioners do not embody lies and falsities in their system of treatment; and their patients are not required to iterate and reiterate a lie or series of lies, to bring about the desired cure. Without making high claims to "divine science," or "Christian Science," their science consistently conforms to sound sense, sound logic, and pure ethical principles.

As regards Mrs. Eddy herself, if instead of making the claims she does as to the divine origin of her system of healing, she had honestly and candidly acknowledged that she "cribbed" it from Phineas P. Quimby, those who are cognizant of the facts in the case could repose greater confidence in her probity.

X-RAY.

AN URGENT WANT.

Give Us a New Bible, in Harmony with Science.

This request may seem strange to many and blasphemous to a few. Let us investigate and see if this request is not reasonable, for it is by investigation we progress. Why is this sacredness thrown around the Bible, because it is claimed to be the word of God, when, in truth, it is the word of man, written in an ignorant age of the world?

Why is the world going wrong? Because error is taught instead of truth. I am a truth seeker and have no use for error even if it is found between the lids of the Bible. Truth will stand; error must fall. I do not say there is no truth in the Bible; far from it. But why not take the truth and let the error go into oblivion with the mythology and traditions of the past?

Some may say that the Bible is the word of God, infallible. Now let us see if we can find an error in the Bible. If there is one, there may be more. One error will destroy the infallibility, and then we will have to use our reason to find the truth. The Bible says the earth was made in six days. Geology and the rocks say it was ages upon ages in forming. The Bible says the sun was made to give light to the earth; astronomy says the earth is an offspring of the sun.

The Bible says the sun stood still that Joshua might kill more of his enemies. I suppose it meant the earth, for only it standing still would have lengthened the day. If the earth had stopped, the momentum would have thrown Joshua and all the Israelites off into space. They might have got on to the moon and formed a colony, then there would have been a man in the moon sure enough. The Bible says a big fish swallowed Jonah. He was in the fish three days and three nights and came out alive. We know the gastric juice of the stomach would have eaten him up in twenty-four hours. Yes, but he was in the whale's belly. Well, he must have got into the stomach first.

I heard Selah Brown preach a sermon in this city on the infallibility of the Bible. He said he believed every word of it—the fish story and all. Said he: "If the Bible had said that Jonah swallowed the whale, I would believe it." Comment is unnecessary.

The Bible says it rained forty days and forty nights (I don't believe it was in Southern California) and the waters covered the whole earth. Query: where did the water come from, and where did it go to when it dried up? But we must not ask questions.

Everything was drowned except Noah and his family, and one pair of each kind. Did not some of those animals have to travel a long distance, the Polar bear for instance? It seems that the animals knew more than the people did at that time, for they knew enough to go in out of the rain. Noah had to take care and feed all these animals for 150 days. What did he feed them on? I think it must have been blind faith. The waters dried up. The Bible says God set a rainbow in the heavens as a sign that there would be no more floods. Now, what causes a rainbow? Is it not the sun's rays shining through water? If they had a sun and rain before the flood, they must have had rainbows. But why quote farther; anyone can read these mythical stories for themselves. Is it not amazing that intelligent people can believe these stories? But some may say all things are possible with God. God never broke one of nature's laws. Prof. Le Conte says God never breaks the laws of nature.

I do not ask for a new Bible for the sake of the hardshell and mossback, but for the children and yet unborn. Where, oh! where is the man who will write us a new Bible that is true and up to the needs of the twentieth century? I do not wish to be disrespectful nor hurt the feelings of any one. I am simply seeking the truth; truth will stand, error must fall.

WHAT IS THE MATTER WITH MOSES HULL?

It is said there are always two sides to a question—there is the right side and there is the wrong side, and unfortunately for Mr. Hull in his recent attack upon the writer, he has stated the wrong or the untruthful side of the little episode regarding the ordination of Mrs. ——, and while it seems out of place to drag personal matters of controversy and dispute before the public, inasmuch as President Hull has set the example, in self-defense I must speak. No doubt Mr. Hull thinks he has made a strong case, but possibly he is unaware of the trap he has sprung for himself by his words. And before reading this I hope every reader of The Progressive Thinker will peruse the article by Mr. Hull in the issue of April 12, that all may know that I do not misquote.

Mr. Hull starts out by reference to a little plesantry I wrote on him and the Bible some time ago, and instead of taking it in the spirit given he received it in sober earnest and it aroused his ire, and the result was a little controversy between his honorable self and the humble writer of these lines, that is no doubt fresh in the minds of many. Mr. Hull says he let me down as easy as possible, but if my memory serves me rightly, in the opinion of many, Brother Moses went down hard, and he has held a gentle grudge against me ever since.

The part of Mr. Hull's recent article referring to the ordination of Mrs. ——, contained the elements of falsity, misrepresentation and misstatement with a small grain of truth; a method of procedure that has been characteristic of the priesthood from time immemorial. I tell you, kind reader, we have to keep an eye out for the "Revs." Mr. Hull says that within a year one of my neighbors—a worthy woman who had been holding meetings in her own home for years (two) sought ordination, all of which is true; it is further added: "She was duly elected by a society to which Mrs. Watson belonged, to be ordained, I believe the vote was unanimous." It is true the vote was taken, but Mr. Hull knows it was not duly (fittingly or rightly) taken. It is further true that Mr. Hull came to Jamestown to ordain Mrs. —— but on learning the condition of affairs he told the candidate and friends that the meeting at which the vote was taken was entirely illegal, and gave reasons why; and said the ordination could not proceed, and this can be attested to by twenty-five persons. Duly elected was she?

I quote: "Mrs. Watson was entirely overcome with the fear that an illiterate person would find a place on the Spiritualist platform," but, good friends, she did not faint, but kept her head level. Again: "She begged and pleaded with me," etc., but I did nothing of the kind. I did write a letter, yes, two, but this was done to clear Mr. Watson from a "thrust" given him by Mr. Hull in his would-be ordination speech, and to explain my own position against a personal attack (which Mr. Hull afterward admitted was uncalled for) upon myself made by the candidate at her would-be ordination. Mr. Hull thinks these letters would make interesting reading; but if published with the same "doctoring" that his representation gives them there would be little semblance to the original.

Now I wish to state the fact about the ordination of Mrs. ——. Mr. Hull came to me at the Lily Dale camp last summer and asked me about the lady, her character, fitness, ability, etc. I said, "She is an estimable woman, but Mr. Hull, I think there has been too many ordinations already;" and he made reply: "I think so too." The matter dropped there at that time. A few days later Mr. Hull said to me in the presence of at least one witness that he did not consider Mrs. —— competent to fill the position of an ordained minister, and added: "She has been a pupil of our training school both when at Maple Dell and here at Lily Dale and it seems impossible for us in our instruction to overcome certain deficiencies in expression, attitude," etc. In reply to this I said, I did not see how our society could recommend her for ordination, as she had given us no opportunity to know of her ability, many times, when invited, refusing to speak for us, saying she did not feel qualified, etc. In less than a week Mr. Hull went to Jamestown to ordain her. Learning, as before stated, that the meeting at which the recommend for ordination was obtained (the writer not then being present) was illegal, he said he could not go on with the proceedings then, but if at a meeting properly called the society still desired her ordination, he would come and ordain her; and yet Mr. Hull says: "In the interest of harmony" and to pacify me he advised her to wait. She had to wait at least just a little. Here let me state the legal meeting was held and the vote was against her; she was not endorsed. Mr. Hull says: "The good lady accepted my advice." But I have to inform him that she did not accept his advice, but it once commenced proceedings necessary, journeyed to a neighboring state, and from one of the "high up" organizations received ordination papers, and whether Mr. Hull knows it or not (and I think he does) the lady is to-day the proud possessor of those important papers, and I have been told she boasts that she received them from a "bigger man" than Moses Hull.

Inasmuch as Mr. Hull followed another fashionable custom of the Revs., a la Covert, and dragged my husband into the matter, I wish to say here a few words in his behalf. The reasons given by Mr. Hull for his resignation were not in accord with fact. The candidate for ordination, only a lay member of the society took the matter of arranging and calling the special meeting entirely out of the president's or any of the officers' hands, the president only being asked at the last moment to sign the call for the meeting (which he did not) but the secretary did. Mr. Watson attended the meeting and told the friends that the matter was not being properly carried forward, that it was a "rush" business; proper time had not been given for the calling of so important a meeting; there had been no notifying of members in proper form, many of them not having heard of it; told them it was entirely contrary to a previous understanding between the candidate and himself and counseled the friends to think well before they acted on so important a matter, etc. His counsel was ignored, and feeling the slight offered him all around as presiding officer, as any person with any self-respect would, resigned his position then and there, all of which I think Mr. Hull understood.

And now I want a word for myself. Mr. Hull says: "Mrs. Watson went away from home to be ordained." I fling back the charge. I did not go away from home; there are ways of getting things without going after them. The U. S. mails sometimes serve us, and I was not "ordained," nor would I consider it any honor to have been prayed over and talked over and "blessed" by the "holy" or unholy hands of any president of any school nor any "pastor" of any society or church. Nothing of the kind ever happened in my career.

There was no society in Jamestown, there was no state organization, and having been a public worker fully fifteen years, lecturing, speaking at funerals, writing for the press and defending Spiritualism in every possible way, time and place, and being advised by many friends, I sought and obtained from the society of "Friends of Human Progress," of North Collins, in my own state, a duly authorized and legal document or certificate empowering me with the right to perform the marriage ceremony, which right I now hold and exercise from time to time. As to my bad grammar and poor logic, which Mr. Hull says he would not attempt to make me know I possess, let me whisper in his ear, when the beloved daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Howe was translated to the better life, Clara Watson officiated at the service customary on such occasions. When the dear old mother of Mrs. Carrie Twing laid down the earth burdens, Clara Watson conducted the service. When George Taylor, one of the best men and noblest and truest speakers that ever graced our platform, passed to the beyond, the writer was called, but having previous engagement, could not respond. And all this time it was known that Moses Hull had a theological schooling and had been known to speak at funerals.

Mr. Hull speaks of his "twenty-five per cent of knowledge." I think he has given himself a fair estimate for a man that cannot descern between an article or a portion of one written wholly in a spirit of irony, and candid, solid soberness and fact, cannot be the possessor of the full quota of ordinary understanding. And I submit that a person so deficient is not fitted to stand at the head of even a theological institution, and I hereby suggest that President Hull be removed and E. W. Baldwin be his successor, for that gentleman had sense perception sufficient to grasp the situation. In the face of facts it looks very much as though there was a great deal of "gush" about the deploring of ignorance and the need of Moses Hull schools, on the part of a man who acknowledged that he did not consider a person competent to assume the position of minister, and yet signify his willingness in so many words to ordain said person. Where is the moral stamina or backbone of such a man? Mr. Hull deplores the small audiences where he says formerly immense audiences gathered, and declares the decline is due to ignorance upon our rostrum. Now here I do want to tell a secret, a proclivity said to belong to woman, and I think I will claim the prerogative anyway. It is known to all readers that one Moses Hull has been occupying the rostrum or pulpit of a Spiritualist society or church for near four years, and now give ear, O reader, for the secret I must tell. It is said that Moses' audiences have not always been immense. The same worthy Mrs. ——, of whom Mr. Hull speaks, is often in Buffalo, and this lady told me not so very many moons ago that she attended Mr. Hull's church and the immense audience consisted of seventeen persons. Again, two old-time, up-to-date Spiritualists were attending the Pan-American last summer, and on Sunday went to the same church. These friends report that in the morning when there was the usual preaching service the audience was very small—a mere handful; in the evening they said a test medium occupied the rostrum and the hall was crowded, and this in Moses Hull's church, after years of effort on his part. I am glad he has informed us where ignorance plays its part. During the past fall and winter Pastor Hull has been absent from his Buffalo charge much of the time and his place has been supplied and this fact has its significance at least to some of us who live in close proximity to the Bison City, and, horror of horrors! one of the workers called as a supply to the Buffalo society was the writer; evidently Pastor Hull neglected to leave orders that no "unschooled" ones be called. But then I did not respond, not caring to make effort to revive or rekindle the waning interest quite apparent under the regime of a college-bred instructor. Give ear again, gentle reader; one of the foremost workers, indeed the one of all others who has kept the Buffalo Temple Society together, speaking of the discouragements, was heard to say—no, I will not tell what; let me prove that woman can keep a secret, or at least a part of one. It would not be courteous or flattering to Mr. Hull to tell all I happen to know; but anyway Mr. Hull does not expect to serve that society another year.

But another little secret about the Training School at Lily Dale is too good to keep. It is told that one pupil was heard to say, that "if the management of the school could not employ teachers that can use as good grammar at least as the pupils, what is the use of coming here to learn grammatical expression? I have detected grammatical errors on the part of the teachers in that department." And I understand the pupil did not consider it worth while to finish the course. I tell you, my friends, schools with high-sounding names have not "got it all," and while I would be glad to share my "seventy-five per cent of knowledge and wisdom" received from the "higher schools" with President Hull, I hardly see how I can. The demands upon my time dispensing the good news to hungry souls, and trying to speak comforting and assuring words unto those whose hearts are torn and bleeding with sorrow and grief, are so great that I am sure I cannot accept the invitation of Mr. Hull to make effort to enlighten him. His pleadings with me to "cease pleading for ignorance on the part of our workers" is a waste of time and energy on his part, for I have never thus pleaded. My plea is and ever has been for education, enlightenment, culture, intelligence, dignity, goodness, and especially truthfulness, to be characteristics of our workers; but I know that all this has been and can be attained unaided by sectarian schools. I am so sorry that I cannot find time to help expand President Hull's intellect, for if I could possibly he might attain unto a degree of intelligence that would enable him to grasp the idea embodied in my statements regarding the noble, talented and cultured speakers whose names I mentioned in my former article. Mr. Hill says: "These all have been and are studious." In the name of goodness, who said they were not? I am certainly amazed at the stupidity of President Hull. I said that these people had been educated in the schools peculiar to Spiritualism, or in the higher spiritual schools. What does education mean? Does it not imply effort on the part of the pupil as well as on the part of the tutor? Whoever heard of a person becoming finely educated and putting forth no effort of his own?

In placing these workers and many others not mentioned, upon the high pedestal that I did, I gave them the highest praise for their own part toward education nobly performed. I did not place such as they in the category of those whose "guides" did not wish them to read, etc. There was no intimation that these workers had not a fair common-school education when they came under the tutelage of spiritual teachers; indeed it is assumed that their parents in common with others gave their children the benefits of ordinary education, but I believe that every one of those spoken of will admit that their fitness for public work came largely through those "higher schools," added of course by their own efforts. If not so, then I stand corrected. Mr. Hull says I classed these persons on the ignorant plane probably as "ad captandum vulgus," (to catch the rabble). But I did not place them there; that is his say-so and not mine. I place them on a higher plane than any theological student made to order the Moses schools will ever be able to turn out. I do not believe that all the training of Mr. Hull or any of his assistants will ever be able to touch the secret springs of the intellect and open the floodgates of sublime inspiration that flows in rhythmical utterance from the lips of a Lyman Howe or a Cora Richmond and others in their grand improvisations. Theology does not contain it to give out.

Mr. Hull accuses me of following in the wake of the old fogies; but it is he that is there, and not myself. Theological institutions are "old fogies," and yet Mr. Hull can see no chance for Spiritualism in the future, only to fall into the ruts of the dead past. A Christian minister in my own city once said in his pulpit, that the majority of students in their own schools came forth "theological mummies," and judging from some specimens turned out, the training schools of Spiritualism will be little if any improvement.

Mr. Hull said in his "notes" recently that "religion never hurt anybody." It had been the "theologies" that had done the mischief, and yet he is working his very best to build up another theology. O, consistency, thou art a jewel not possessed by some Revs. Again Mr. Hull says: "Yes, I am a religious man." Another object lesson that religion does not tend to truthfulness and integrity of purpose. If he could only be induced to give up his religion and substitute spiritual unfoldment, which means to be true at all times and in all places, I am sure he would be the gainer.

But I think I must tell another secret about that ordination. To the credit of our society be it said that in voting upon the matter it was only to recommend Mrs. —— to the state organization for ordination, and the notice to Mr. Hull from our secretary so stated, which is all the society has the right to do. However, Mr. Hull said we had the legal right to ordain and came here with his grip full of prayers and huge parcels of blessings, ready to sacrifice his manhood and ordain one whom he had said he did not consider worthy.

But it turns out that the society was right; I am informed that according to the laws of the state of New York, our society has no ordaining power, having no authority from the state legislature, a charter from the state association (which we possess) not being sufficient; the state organization being so empowered, but not us, and yet Moses Hull, the would-be "high priest" of Spiritualism, as president of the state body did not know "where he was at." His time had evidently been pre-occupied studying about "Paul" and "Aaron" and "Amos," etc., and fixing up his new theology to the exclusion of information regarding the rights of the organization whose president he is, and its subordinate bodies.

And here I wish to most humbly beg pardon of Mrs. —— for being called upon in self-defense to bring her so prominently into public notice; and I wish further to say that if Mr. Hull denies the truthfulness of the statements made regarding this matter, he places the ban of falsifier upon himself.

Mr. Hull asks me if schools of a mundane source would not correct some of the "evils" of mispronunciation of words and the incorrect formation of sentences of which he speaks. Yes, any of our public schools would do that (no special schools are needed) provided these people knew they were faulty in learning and could be induced to go to school; but as I stated in my former article, they do not know that they do not know, and no one will tell them, and judging from what I know I have no doubt that Mr. Hull would "ordain" any one of those he speaks of if called upon.

Again, Mr. Hull says, "It is an insult to an audience to place such ignorance before it." But, my dear sir, they place themselves there through lack of judgment and good sense, and if some one will inform me in what way the Moses Hull schools can exert a greater influence over ignorance than our thousands of public schools, and prevent persons that don't know that they are ignorant from starting a "meetin'" if they choose, they will confer a favor.

Do I believe in education? Yes, and Moses Hull knows it as well as any one. First, in our common schools which is the birthright of every child, and then in conjunction with the spirit teachers I would have such instructors as W. M. Lockwood, J. Clegg Wright, Hudson Tuttle and many others who have gotten out of the miasma of orthodox mimfery, mummery and old-fogyism, into the clear atmosphere of science, philosophy, reason and sound sense.

This article is already too long, but I wish to say just a word to my other critics. Harry Moore asks if I would take a "circuit" in Indiana, would I feel competent to without a theological training? No, I don't think I would. Circuits are too orthodox for me; I do not hanker after them; indeed I would not take one as a free gift.

And one or two statements of E. W. Baldwin I wish to comment on. This friend accuses me of driving cultivated and enlightened Spiritualists back into the churches. How little we know sometimes regarding the truthfulness of the statements we make. Enlightened Spiritualists are not afraid to hear the truth told. Mr. Baldwin says: "She takes away their God, their theology, their religion, their prayers, their forms and ceremonies, many of which are beautiful." I shall have to plead guilty to this charge. At least I do all I can to accomplish this, and really I thought this was one of the grand missions of Spiritualism. The church has its angry, vengeful, cruel, vindictive, adulterous, murderous, tyrannical God; it has a theology as contrary to the laws of nature as the inventive genius of priestcraft could formulate; it has a religion that holds the human mind and soul and body in direst ignorance and fear and abject slavery; it has its prayers of lip service, of adulation and flattery unto Deity, with petitions to God to set aside nature's inexorable laws; it has its forms and ceremonies, and even if beautiful in outward expression, yet useless and senseless, a waste of time and energy and many of them degrading and demoralizing to mind and body; and I confess all the energy within me has been and shall be given to take from church people that come into Spiritualism all this that has been a curse to their lives. I have been there and know whereof I speak, and I give them as a substitute not "a little talk with a spirit" but a philosophy or system in accord with nature, rooted and grounded on or in Nature's unchanging laws. And there are other things that Spiritualism takes away from the church people who come to us, and that is their all-powerful devil, their spacious hell, and their narrow-contracted heaven; and let the good work go on.

THE RETURN OF THE BIRDS.

They have come again to the old pine tree,
I knew they would when they left last fall;
They are back again in their joy and glee,
The robin, the linnet, the thrush and all.

As I quietly sit by my window to-day,
I watch two robins building their nest;
They have perched it up on the topmost branch—
Were ever two robins so happy and blest?

Weaving it closely and firmly and strong,
Making it hollow, cozy and soft;
He thinks no exertion, or care too great
To build her a home in the tree aloft.

They are up in the morn, at peep of day,
And all day long, till the light is gone,
These happy creatures are on the wing.

These are happy days for you, lady bird,
But weary ones too will come to you;
While your mate coos a love song tender and true.

Then your anxious heart will worry and fret,
When the headstrong things will leave the nest;
You can only show them the use of their wings,
Knowing nature will teach the rest.

I am glad you are back in the old pine tree;
I missed you so when you went away;
For drear and sad was the winter time,
Without your song at the close of day.

So I give you a welcome sincere and true;
For many a care you lift from my breast;
And teach me sweet lessons of patience and trust,
While I watch you busily building your nest.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

LETTER NUMBER THIRTEEN.

Groaning, weary, heavy-laden,
Lo! I see a weeping maiden.
Sad and desolate she moans:
Such distress might move the stones.

Who has dared to blast this flower,—
Made such cursed use of power?
Who has bound this maid in chains?
Demons haunt him for his pains!

I will raise the drooping slave.
Woman, rise! Be free, be brave!
Thy galling chains will break
And the consequences take.

I felt like quoting from one of my old rhymes before commencing this letter. I called it at the time, Man, Woman and Priest; little dreaming then that as a man, I should be called upon to open the prison doors of the slaves of priests and set their captors free. But it is a glorious work, and may I never cease in my efforts until every woman on the earth, and in the lower spheres of earth, is free from priestly bondage.

The morrow, which Father Ambrose had established, soon came. I heard him moving about near me and I joined him. He looked weary and dejected. He took my hand.

"Must I, then, do as you have said?" he asked.

"You must," I answered. "It is the only path left for you to take—the only one that leads to your restoration and eventually to happiness. What a load of guilt and sin you are bearing at the present time. Ambrose, have you ever known happiness?"

He shook his head sadly.

"Never!" he ejaculated. "Never for an instant since my childhood. As an innocent child I was happy for awhile."

"If your manhood had been as innocent as your childhood, you would have been happy; and now, as a spirit, you would have been supremely blest; but despair not. I am not here to cause you misery but to lead the way to future happiness; such happiness as you have never known, not even in innocent childhood. We will go now and open the doors of the nunnery. This is the first step for you to take toward your own redemption, for you must redeem yourself, if redemption and pardon ever come to you. No Christ nor holy Mother of God can save your soul from hell, for you are the maker of your own hell, and that which you have made remains for you to unmake. Shall we now go and release these captives?"

Ambrose raised the rosary which hung by his girdle and beside the pendant cross hung a key. He took the key between his thumb and finger.

"Follow me," he said, droopingly, and together we passed through a secret door leading from the apartment, from thence through a long, dark corridor, down—down into regions of miasmic—spiritual miasm. At the far end a number of candles were dimly burning, a candle near each grated door. He inserted the key and unlocked the first door. I peered into the small apartment or cell; the cell of a nun. A stricken creature sat there on a low stool, the spirit of one who once bore the form of an earthly woman. Although she had left the mortal body behind, the spiritual was an exact counterpart of the earthly, and her surroundings were precisely the same. There was nothing in the cell but a small cot, a little table with a crucifix upon it, and one other chair, besides the stool on which she sat. She was gaunt and wild-eyed, her neck like parchment and her hands like claws. A dark robe, almost in tatters, hung about her shapeless form. As the door of her cell swung open, she started forward eagerly, but as her eyes fell upon me she sunk back in a heap, covering her face with her hands, for a nun is supposed never to look upon the face of a man, except the face of the confessor or priest.

"Sister Teresa," said the priest, "I have come to tell you that changes are about to take place in this dormitory. When you hear the bell ring for prayers you are to go into the cathedral with the congregation. Do you hear and understand? Remember you are not in the earthly life now, and I am no longer responsible for the changes that may come to you." He flung the door wide as he spoke.

"Look up," he commanded. "Can you not see that I am not alone?"

She allowed her hands to drop away from her face. Her large eyes looked into mine like those of a frightened child's, then she sank upon her knees and cowered and shook.

"Get up! I say," ordered the priest, sternly. "Come forth and go up-stairs into the main apartment."

He stepped one side with a wave of his hand, she flitted out and down the dark corridor toward some stairs that were now visible but which I had not noticed before. There were a dozen or more cells, all alike. He unlocked the door of each precisely as he had done the first, and the same scene was re-enacted again and again. These nuns appeared very much alike, very much as rats look alike, each one in its hole; still, of course, there was a distinction not to be observed by a stranger in the dim light of the candles, for all these nuns had, for many years of earthly time, led precisely the same kind of life.

"There," said I, as we reached the last door; "those women must never return to these cells again, or if they must from habit return, the doors must not be locked; but I hope to soon open their eyes to the truth of their condition, so that they may not wish to return to these noisome cells."

So we left the doors all flung wide open, never more to be locked on their human spiritual victims. When the last door had been flung wide, and the last nun had descended the stairs, we, too, went up and entered the large room whither they had gone. This was much better than the cells, for large windows let in the light of day. In this room the nuns usually took their meals, for all earthly habits were kept up as previously stated. The large windows were grated, however. An immense dining table stood in the center of the room and hard-bottomed chairs were ranged around against the walls. The nuns had already seated themselves in these chairs. The room was bare of everything else. As we entered every eye glared in affright, for all could see that I was no priest.

Ambrose gave them a malignant scowl. At this moment there entered the room the Lady Superior. She darted a fiery glance at me as she cried:

"What is the meaning of all this? The breakfast bell has not yet sounded. Who has unlocked the doors of the dormitories?"

"Silence! Agatha," thundered the priest. "It was I who unlocked the doors; and I have come here to say that these women, all of them are, together with yourself, to come to service when the bell sounds. Remember we are not upon the earth now, and changes are coming to us. See to it that I am obeyed," he said a little more softly to the woman he had addressed as Agatha.

Agatha's appearance was not at all like the nuns'. She was plump and fair, with large, fascinating eyes, in which lurked great hypnotic power. Her manner was haughty and commanding.

"May I ask," she said, "who this gentleman may be that you bring here at this unseasonable hour?" She threw back her head, staring at me defiantly.

"Ambrose," I said, quietly, "you had better tell her who I am." The priest looked nettled as he made reply:

"This, Mother Agatha, is one William Denton. Our Lady Superior, Agatha."

"William Denton!" she cried with blanched cheeks and pallid lips. "William Denton, that blasphemer and reviler of God's holy word, that hell-born wretch! What can have induced you, Father Ambrose, to bring him here? How is it that he is not in hell with the devil whom he served so long on earth? Why is it that he is not frying and squirming on a red-hot gridiron, with an imp of hell turning him like toast? Why is it, I say?" and she stamped her pretty foot, for her foot was pretty withal; and even in her face she was a superb woman. I stepped forward and bowed before her respectfully, for no matter how misguided a woman may be, she is a woman, and as such deserves man's homage.

"Madame," I said, "I am not in hell because, as I stoutly maintained when on the earth, there is no hell nor devil, consequently, as you see, I am here."

"This—this," she stammered, "is purgatory."

"You are wrong, madame. There is no purgatory."

"Base liar!" she cried, glancing at the cowering, frightened nuns. "This is purgatory, where we are awaiting God's mercy and pardon, or the yawning, sulphurous abyss of hell." You see a woman usually puts things stronger than a man.

"Say your prayers and count your beads," she commanded, throwing her eyes around over the trembling nuns. "No doubt the devil himself is just outside, keeping guard over this black spirit, and must have sent him in first to see if, perchance, some of you might waver in your allegiance to God, and he would then take you hence to him at once." At this the nuns fell on their knees, crossing themselves again and again, and then holding up their crucifixes, muttered and mumbled supposedly prayers. I believe if I had not been sustained by an angelic host I should have turned away disheartened, for I never was good at opposing or quareling with a woman. Ambrose was quick to see that for the moment I was weakened; and, strange as it may seem, I knew that he was sorry. One can see that hope had already sprung up within the man's heart, and instead of taking advantage of my momentary weakness he came to my rescue.

"Agatha," he said, "Mr. Denton came here alone, and I have decided to listen to what he has to say to us."

"Do you, then, fly in the face of the God who has sent you back to us that we might yet be saved? Do you realize, Father Ambrose, that these promised brides of heaven are listening to us?"

Ambrose turned and looked at the group of helpless, hopeless, bloodless skeletons, and a look of pity swept over his face. Ah, he was softening at last!

"Do not be afraid," I murmured. "Tell them the truth and let these poor creatures go free."

Ambrose turned and faced them.

"Daughters," he said, "you have confessed to me for many years; it is now my turn. I have a confession to make. I have not seen God nor heaven, consequently God has not commissioned me to take charge of your souls. I have deceived you all, but I thought it for the best. I fear, Mother Agatha, that hell and the devil do not exist. I have also come to think that this is not purgatory, but it is, as Mr. Denton tells us, one of the spiritual realms. That we are spirits now you all know, and at Mr. Denton's suggestion I think of turning this establishment into schools and temples of wisdom." He again turned to the quivering nuns.

"You are free from this moment, every one of you, to go when and where you please; but if you prefer to remain here you may become pupils within schools that will shortly be established; in the meantime you had better find your ways outside of these walls and learn all you can from other spirits with which this world is filled. There, Mr. Denton, are you satisfied?" he asked, turning to me.

"More than satisfied," I answered. "You have done bravely, nobly, and you already feel the recompense within your own soul."

"Ah! I begin to feel that a great work of redemption is before me which it will take many, many years, as earthly time is counted, to perform. My sins and shortcomings are pouring in upon me like a flood. Agatha," he said, "Agatha, you I claim, and you alone. You must remain with me and be my wife—my companion—my other self. You I love and you alone. Let us listen to our own souls and not be blind leaders of the blind any longer."

Agatha seemed to have forgotten my presence entirely.

"Do you mean it, Ambrose?" she said with a sob. "Will you marry me and let these others go? Will you be true to me, and me alone? Oh, Ambrose, this is more than I ever hoped," and she fell weeping upon his neck.

"Agatha," he said, "I have long thought that no man has a right to more than one wife, or one woman rather, and that woman should be his wife. My secret soul has protested against this nunnery business for a long time, much longer," he said, turning again to me, "than you think. All sinners have a secret consciousness that they are doing wrong, and my conscience has been ill at ease these many years. Mr. Denton has come to set me free."

Agatha glanced at me from out the corners of her eyes.

"I have loved him," she said, "since we were little children together. He used often to call me his wife—his little wife—promising me always that I should some day be his wife; and when he became a priest I wept myself almost blind; then I determined that I would enter a convent, the one he was more nearly connected with, that I might ever be near him and see him as often as possible, and he, and he alone, should be my father confessor. Oh!" she wailed, "I was so innocent then and knew so little."

"You need not confess to me," I said. "I know all without that. I also know another thing that perhaps you do not as yet: You are his real other-self, his soul-mate, the other half of himself, the female half, his wife, through great, eternal, natural laws that you may not understand at present. You called me a liar and a fiend, fit only for hell and the devil, a short time ago; but I shall be the one to show you the road to eternal happiness for all of that." She blushed as she said:

"Forgive me—forgive me! I knew not what I did."

"Yes," I said, "we must all forgive many; for they know not what they do; and now we can count on your help, Lady Agatha, for Ambrose will need you sadly. We are about to enlighten these people, to tell them the truth, and by so doing to let their souls go free. When the bell strikes we all must meet the assembled throng."

"You will see to it, Agatha, that these nuns are present," said Ambrose.

"I will," she replied, and Ambrose and I went back to his own apartments to await the stroke of the bell.

WILLIAM DENTON,
Or, if you prefer, SPIRIT WILLIAM DENTON.

(To be Continued.)

THE MAN WHO ALWAYS SMILES.

His house may not a mansion be; his place inside the line
Where common people stand and note their richer neighbor's shine;
But yet his life's a grander one, though lacking much of style.

Though he never limned a ladscape he's an artist in his way;
He's a picture fair of joyousness in a frame that's always gay;
His life's a useful sermon, and he's preaching all the while,
And he's better off than governors—the man who always smiles.

He's one of life's physicians without antidotes or pills;
His cures are freely given to all men's current ills;
He's a missionary worker, leaving out the heathen isles,

—Ex.

With respect to the authority of great names it should be remembered that he alone deserves to have any weight of influence with posterity, who has shown himself superior to the particular and predominant error of his own times.—Colton.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

SPIRITUALISM IN RUSSIA.

"What in me is dark
Illumine, what is low raise and support,
That to the height of this great argument
I may assert eternal Providence,
And justify the ways of God to Men."
—Milton.

If the lines of thought are in the present age, and in many countries, somewhat ordinary and highly materialistic, there are, nevertheless, individuals in every land for whom the occult has an immense charm; and knowing that numbers of the latter are to be found in practical England, I venture to offer this brief article to the readers of Light:

The Russian—from the highest to the lowest—is conscious of a great force in nature, believes that he possesses a soul, and is not too skeptical to assert that this soul may be so cultivated as to at length attain to great spirituality. He also gives proof positive of his faith in the magnetic touch by the confidence which he places in the Pere Jean, of Cronstadt, whose fame is doubtless known to all your readers.

"And what is the base of this great credulity? Is it the remnant of an exploded medieval superstition which accepted every fairy tale?" asks the skeptic; to whom we simply reply, "No; it is the continuation of that pure and simple faith which once ruled a great portion of the earth; it is a firm belief in a Being, greater than all other beings, and capable of greater things."

Then there is the pious, church-going man or woman, who repudiates anything and everything which is un peu hors de la nature, or who, if he or she admits evidence of Spiritualistic influence at all, at once attributes it to the Devil. This type of person is really too silly to argue with, and when one meets it one simply listens as gravely as possible, and feels—to say the least—slightly amused and somewhat surprised to think that in the enlightened twentieth century such arrant ignorance is to be found. The skeptic is open to conviction, and is often extremely interesting, but the narrow-minded "ignorant" has drawn down all the blinds of his small mind, and does not mean to admit any of the sunshine of psychology. "No such wickedness for me!" is his motto.

Well, in Russia those who are interested in Spiritualism—and they are legion—may, without fear of being considered either ridiculous or wicked, air their views, have their meetings, etc., and though many fear to probe this absorbing subject too deeply, all are sufficiently courageous for a little table moving. In the provinces, especially, one finds people who constantly devote an evening to this, and I have met a family in which the youngest son—an officer of promise and great physical strength—possesses such mental force that by placing the finger tips on a large wardrobe or dining-room table he can cause either or them to rise several feet from the ground. This force was discovered quite accidentally at one of the little evenings in question, and the said young man holds constant communion with his grandfather, who joined the great majority years ago.

The following story is so weird that could I not vouch for its veracity I should hesitate to give it:

The widow of a simple Russian priest, who had no children, adopted a year or so ago a girl of twelve. Shortly after the arrival of the child strange noises were heard in the house, and it frequently happened that the doors of cupboards—which were locked, and of which this good woman had the keys—were flung open. The little girl one day told her adopted mother that while alone she had seen two men in one of the rooms, and that they had spoken quite kindly to her. The flinging open of cupboard doors was soon followed by the withdrawal of clothes, etc., and the two men began to show themselves more frequently to the little girl, who feared them so little that when a dress or coat of her guardian-mother's was wanted (one of those which had been taken) she used to ask the apparitions to put it back, and her request was invariably granted. The poor widow herself became very anxious. She had never been subjected to any inconvenience till the child came, and it was evident, she thought, that the raid upon her things was a rather violent way of showing her that she had made a mistake in taking the little girl away from her previous surroundings. She was thoroughly convinced that the two visitors belonged to another world, and all her friends advised her to forego the pleasure of an adopted daughter; still she would not give in; and a few months ago I heard that she was unable to accept some daily employment—offered her by the sister of an acquaintance of my own—because the mystical visitors had now actually taken to cutting holes in her garments, and she thus found herself in too tattered a condition to appear in public. Evidently this poor child's Karma is to be fulfilled elsewhere, and the sooner the poor lone widow recognizes the fact the better for her and her little belongings. So the land which gave birth to Madame Blavatsky is one which does not mind admitting that "there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in our philosophy;" it is one which does not pooh-pooh, unheard, all that it cannot immediately grasp, and though, like other intellectual nations, it does not believe in any and every thing Spiritualistic, it readily admits that if there were no diamonds there would be no paste."

St. Petersburg. S. CLAIR.

As was to be expected, the capture of Frau Rothe and her confederate, Jentsch, is the subject of universal comment in this month's psychical journals.

The "Uebersinnliche Welt," which hitherto has refrained from any mention of the Rothe seances and the controversy to which they have given birth, has two papers, indirectly dealing with the subject; while in the "short notices" almost the whole space is given up to an account of the seizure by the police and remarks upon that event. Among these it is only just to that journal to copy the following short paragraphs:

"Even as long ago as the year 1894 we warned our readers in the 'Uebersinnliche Welt'—pages 136 and 162 to 166—against the fraudulent practices of Frau Rothe; but unfortunately our warning had no effect upon her enthusiastic adherents.

"Our reticence in the Rothe matter has often exposed us to reproaches from both her adherents and her opponents; but we thought it only right to keep our journal as far as possible clean, and free from the dirt clinging to the Rothe affair."

The "Spiritische Rundschau," which in its warm partisanship of Frau Rothe might almost have been called a "Rothe organ," now treats the subject very cautiously; and only one page is this month devoted to the "Rothe affair!" After a very brief mention of the police capture, a short account is given of a meeting of the Psyche "Loge" on March 7, at which the subject was discussed, the opinions of the members being divided. The following is the concluding sentence:

"In the case of Rothe, the police have only forestalled us; and we must just say that at the last sitting of the "Loge" the members had determined, in view of the many suspicious circumstances attending Frau Rothe's mediumship lately, to proceed with the greatest caution, to enforce tests, and to expose any attempt at fraud."

The editor says that he thinks it only fair to withhold the expression of any opinion till the case is finished.

As this case cannot but excite much interest among Spiritualists in England, as well as on the Continent, I have read all the accounts in the different journals. Dr. Maier, in "Psychische Studien," deals with the matter at some length. The first portion of this long paper (some five pages) is occupied by his own opinions and remarks on the case, but as he had never seen Frau Rothe, and had no personal experience of her "mediumship," I think the "Nachtrag"—Appendix—which occupies the concluding eight pages, and contains all the police reports and other details, will be of greater interest to readers of "Light;" I will, therefore, translate the first account nearly in full. Other reports are the same in essentials, but contain some differences of detail:

"Frau Rothe, together with her impressario Jentsch, was brought up today, at noon, before the President of the Police and afterwards committed to the House of Detention. Rothe's husband was released, there not being sufficient evidence of his complicity in the fraud to warrant his detention. The following interesting particulars have been communicated to us concerning this sensational capture:

"The criminal police has for a long time been keeping a watchful eye on the medium Rothe's seances, and even before Christmas some of the members of the force had succeeded in obtaining an entrance to one or two sittings, in order to step in at the right moment. But it became more and more difficult to get admission to these seances, as the manager Jentsch, for the most part only admitted persons whom he knew, or had information about.

"The officers of the criminal police Herr von Kracht and Herr Leonhardt, together with a female agent, were within a hairbreadth of not being admitted to the seance of last Saturday. This commenced at 8 p. m. in Jentsch's rooms, No. 6 Winterfeldstrasse, which he shared with the Rothes. Fourteen visitors were present. (The usual preliminaries took place) and then in the well-lighted room, accompanied by all sorts of hocus-pocus, the apports commenced. After about three-quarters of an hour, Rothe stood up in "medial exaltation," and threw several flowers across the table to a gentleman, when Herr von Kracht seized the medium by both her wrists and held her fast, while Leonhardt seized her on the other side. As she refused to confess her fraud, she was led into the adjoining room, while a number of police officers, who had entered the seance room, took the names and addresses of the persons present, afterwards arresting Rothe's husband and daughter.

"Frau Rothe should then have been searched by the female agent, but she struggled desperately, and succeeded in getting one hand free, with which she struck the female a violent blow, but was finally over powered and her hands held, while the agent relieved her of her treasure of flowers, which she had kept in a sack-like contrivance sewn on her petticoat, to which it was but little trouble to obtain access through an opening in her dress skirt, and then by means of skillful sleight-of-hand make the flowers appear as though falling from above. The bag attached to the petticoat still contained about one hundred and fifty flowers.

Another account says thirteen bunches of flowers were found, besides three oranges and as many apples. Then follows a description of the way in which Jentsch collected the entrance fees, varying from five shillings to as much as wealthy persons in high positions chose to give. The party, consisting of Rothe, Jentsch, and the husband and daughter of the former, were taken to the police station in a cab and examined. The daughter was liberated and the husband set free the next day; Rothe and Jentsch were kept in prison, where, I suppose, they still are, for I cannot find anything said about bail.

"The energetic proceedings on the part of the police are evidently to be attributed to advice from 'high quarters,' if not directly to the well-known interview between the Emperor William and the President of Police, Von Windheim, as well as the General Superintendent, Dr. Faber, at which the Emperor expressed his desire that the increasing interest in aristocratic circles in Spiritism and Christian Science should be suppressed."

In another place it is said that there are as many as two hundred circles in Berlin, but as no money is taken in these private circles, the police can have no hold upon them.

It appears that the police, on visiting Frau Rothe's rooms, found lists of her clients, with their addresses, among whom were persons of the highest aristocracy. Of some of these the police made inquiries at their own residences in order to ascertain what money had been taken; they all agreed that they had no suspicion of any deception, and many, in spite of the exposure, still expressed their conviction of the medium's genuineness. Both the accused were photographed in the prison. They have on several occasions declined to confess, and appeal to Professor Sellin and Dr. Egbert Muller to vindicate them.

Dr. Maier writes in a footnote that it is reported from Chemnitz (but denied by the Chemnitz Daily News) that the police have obtained from friends and relations living there a number of letters and papers of an incriminating nature, one especially from Frau Rothe herself, in which she expresses a hope that humbug may find as many profitable believers in Berlin as in Chemnitz. Of course if such letters have been seized, they will come out at the trial.

"The preliminary inquiries in the Rothe case have now discovered a clue to where the flower apports came from. A gardener and a flower seller who have their stalls in the Winterfeldplatz on market days, recognized Frau Rothe directly as the person who for some long time past had, every market day, purchased from them, to the amount of between two and three marks, flowers of different kinds, and branches of fir. They thought their customer was in the employment of some family of position, and that the flowers were for table decoration, while the fir branches were, she said, to put on her child's grave. As after Rothe was imprisoned, their customer failed to appear, they communicated their suspicions to the police officers. These think that Rothe must have made purchases of flowers at other markets also, and are anxious to obtain information about it. Further researches into the business part of the transactions of the Rothe and Jentsch couple have elicited the fact that the evening receipts have amounted to between nine and eleven hundred marks (shillings)."

The Editor writes:

"From the standpoint of our aforementioned experiences with Frau Rothe, we have purposely avoided mixing ourselves in any way with the discussion, in spite of the persistent efforts of Jentsch to elist the sympathies of the "Uebersinnliche Welt" on behalf of his questionable cause. At first we looked on Frau Rothe as a pathological swindler, till in course of time we could no longer disguise from ourselves the fact that with the aid of her confederates she consciously cheated. We think that in the face of the facts now brought to light, there can be no further question as to whether she was or is really a medium. If in her case conscious imposture is proved—which, looking at the situation in which she was caught by the officers, must be taken as granted—there is no question about the matter, and she must be condemned and avoided by all right-thinking persons. All attempts at vindicating her seems to us an insult to the holiest feelings of humanity."

UNIVERSALISM

The Herald of the Christ of Spiritualism.

It occurs to me that the theology of Universalism and the philosophy of Spiritualism are complements of each other and sustain in history a divine or spiritual relation. One preceded the other as John preceded Christ, and as the message of the Christ supplemented the message of John, so does the mission of Spiritualism supplement the mission of Universalism.

The Universalist church came preaching in the wilderness, saying "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." It addressed itself to the Pharisees and Sadducees of the old church and said unto them, "Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" It came denouncing the fear of divine wrath, preaching good news and teaching that the "goodness of God leadeth to repentance," and held that the works worthy of repentance were not ritual works but good moral works, such as had to do with one's neighbors. It held that the children of the church of Abraham have no advantage over other people, for God is able of these stones to raise up seed unto Abraham.

The Universalist church is to the church of Spiritualism as John was to Christ. The John of Universalism prepared the way for the Christ of Spiritualism.

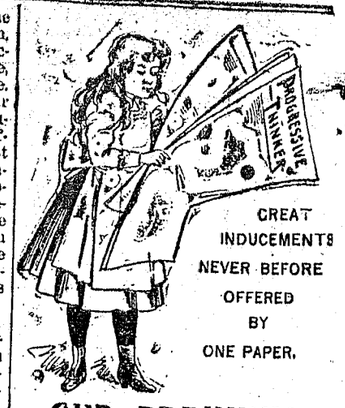
The former marks the last days of the old dispensation; the latter the beginning of the new dispensation. The Universalist church having accomplished its mission and fulfilled its appointed work in abrogating theological fear, is now in a state of decadence; the Spiritualist church having only entered upon its formulative period, is organizing for an aggressive and far-reaching campaign. One shall decrease, the other increase, as organic movements. One announced the coming of the Christ, the other manifests the Christ which is the resurrection and the life, and commissions eye-witnesses of the resurrection. The mission of Universalism of God, and the mission of Spiritualism is of God, both brought to earth by the angel world. It is as evident in history that the Universalist church is as much the work of spirits as the movement of Spiritualism, and in its beginning in the United States was attended by unquestionable guidance by spirits. Sometime I will be glad to give to the readers of your valuable paper the story of Rev. John Murray, who left his native country, England, and came to America with a full determination of not being known as a preacher; and the story of John Potter, who lived near the coast in Virginia, who a few years prior to the coming of John Murray, built a church in obedience to the voice of the spirit which told him he would send a preacher and, when John Murray came, Mr. Potter knew him at sight and claimed the voice said "that is your preacher, Mr. Potter."

Mr. Murray tried to lie out of it, but it did not go with the clairaudient Potter.

I was regularly ordained as a Universalist minister, and having been forced by spirits to realize that spirits through mortals can prove to the satisfaction of the most skeptical that what I preached as a hope may be demonstrated as a fact, I am prepared to accept ordination from the church of Spiritualism and henceforth be as zealous and untiring in the promotion of the cause of the Spiritualist church as I have been for Universalism. But I shall ever hold the Universalist church in high esteem for its great work in emancipating human minds from the slavery of fear. A desire to remove fear and dread from the mind is the motive that actuated me in the Universalist ministry. I could go on working as a Universalist minister were it not for the fact that certain minds in every community need the facts of Spiritualism to overcome their doubts and build them up in spiritual knowledge, but in making use of such facts which are provided by the spiritual world for that purpose, I could not do it with that freedom which is the right and duty of the minister of the gospel of the arisen Christ.

About twelve years ago, in Iowa, when I was active in the Universalist ministry, holding the responsible position of chairman of committee of Fellowship, Ordination and Discipline, I wrote to the Gospel Banner, a Universalist paper published in Maine, asking these questions:

1. Is it right and proper for a minister of the gospel to investigate those facts which thousands of eye-witnesses affirm prove that what he preaches is true? Or is it right for him to ignore those facts?



2. Having investigated those facts which are claimed by hundreds and thousands as proof of the hope of immortality, is it the duty of the minister ordained to preach that hope, to announce the facts if they demonstrate immortality? or is it his duty to keep silent?

To these questions I received all sorts of answers.

I recognize the movement of Spiritualism as most in accord with the movement of early Christianity, and though very imperfect is the first gleams of light just before the golden dawn of a grander day.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It is characteristic of highly educated men along well defined grooves and beaten paths, who despite every educational advantage never can soar above the plane of respectable mediocrity, to regard a popular interest in spiritual manifestations as indicative of atavism—as the sign of a retrograde movement to medievalism or barbarism; to view the question of a spiritual life as beyond reason, and spiritual phenomena as ultra scientific, and personal spiritual experiences as abnormal, irrational, almost or wholly insane; and to refer to the scientific method as opposed to the mental processes of those who claim some knowledge of life on a higher plane than the physical one. They deplore the popular demand for stories of psychic experiences and with a scientific phraseology which insinuates that the realms of science are bounded by their own limitations, refer to that influence and condition which moves the multitude to manifest an interest in spiritual healing, clairvoyance, etc., as proof of their lack of reason and the scientific spirit, assuming that a rational mind would consider evidence of any kind on these subjects as unworthy of investigation. Yet every physical science from astronomy to anatomy has been a field of conjecture, theory, imagination; a battle ground of opinion as truly as that of religion, and while the scientific method of experimental research is the only one of winnowing the wheat from the chaff and getting at exact knowledge on any subject, there was chopping and digging, plowing and sowing, before the grain was ready for the scientist with his separator; and it is not more just or intelligent to assume that a modern Spiritualist is on a par with the frenzied votaries of bygone ages than to assume that a chemist believes in all the wild theories of the alchemist or an astronomer in all the vagaries of the ancient astrologer.

One who is a worthy disciple and fellow of the great scientist, if referring at all to the condition which moves thousands of the sick to visit Lourdes, Denver, or the shrine of St. Anne, will not do so with supercilious scorn, but will inquire, will investigate whether any have touched the hand of Schlatter, the bones of St. Anne, or the waters of Lourdes, and have then thrown away their crutches and drugs; and if so, proceed to consider and if possible determine what agency has been the real one in producing the result. Taking no laurels from the brow of the physical scientist, he is yet a pigmy in comparison with the man who carries the scientific method into the psychic realm, and who in his own personal development through supermundane experiences preserves the scientific spirit to "prove all things."

True indeed, Spiritualism is not, yet, generally speaking, on a solid scientific basis. Listening to many "inspirational" orators who, when emerging from the safety of a position which consists in stating vague generalities in familiar phrases which may be construed as meaning this, that or 'tother, frequently contradict each other one is reminded of the lament of Jesus in his day, that they were scattered as sheep having no shepherd; and the investigator who wants to be led, and that only along clear and flowery paths, is discouraged or in a quandary as to what the philosophy of Spiritualism may be; for what one means by that phrase varies greatly from what another means.

We have come with varied endowments out of so many and various religious schools, carrying with us as much as possible of the good and bad. Every recruit wants a conspicuous place in the temple for the idols of his fathers, as well as "the dollars of our daddies."

As the Indian classified every Caucasian whether from Russia or California as a "Boston man," so do people carelessly designate as a Spiritualist anyone who acknowledges spirit communication. Now there has never been a religious system flourished in the world but was founded on such a faith. Worshipers of Baal and Rimmon, fathers and mothers who gave their babes into the redhot arms of a molten idol, believed in this; so did the inventors of the rack and thumbscrew; so does nearly every primitive tribe in Africa or the Cannibal Islands, but they are not all Spiritualists in the sense I use the term. I mean by the word one who in addition to this accepts a philosophy of life and especially of morals or ethics which is saner and simpler than any other and more free from a confusing metaphysical jargon.

Forty or fifty years ago, as I learn, the issue was more clearly cut, and as the god-makers of Athens opposed the Christians as "those who turn the world upside down" and teach that "the gods which we make are no gods;" and "this our craft whereby we make our living is in danger," so did every orthodox preacher and teacher and designer of gods in America or Europe recognize in a Spiritualist one whose moral and religious ideas were radical if not revolutionary.

To-day it is somewhat different. On the principle of the Dutchman who, wishing to have a short-tailed dog, would not cruelly cut off all at once, but cut off one inch and when that healed cut off another and another until it was of the required length, we try to persuade every sectarian that the issue between Spiritualism and orthodoxy is only upon minor points. Language is used to conceal thought and the lack of thought with us as with our friends the enemy, and most assertive orators and writers represent Spiritualism variously as a divine system calculated to embrace every theory and fad imaginable, and to be concerned mainly in furthering his own hobby.

The rocky road to Dublin."

Reference to spiritual things has generally been vague, indirect, ambiguous language, because the speaker or writer lacked experience, logic, and had hazy ideas himself. To a degree this speaking in parables has been wisely out of consideration for the superstitious fears and the dullness of common men. A Kaffir would throw away a diamond to grasp a bead of yellow glass, and the very intelligent American will sometimes cheerfully pay the druggist one dollar an ounce for "aqua pura" when he would not give a cent per barrel for pure water. A degree of ambiguity is excusable in dealing with such men. Now a woodchopper would express in plain language what appeals to him as some of the fundamental principles, the distinctive ideas of modern Spiritualism. To quote Artemus Ward "there's one thing I like about me"—my ideas may or may not be shallow, but on some vital points they are so clear that the wayfaring man though a fool shall not err in discovering what I mean.

There be some who, being in no degree sensitive themselves, sit on the fence as it were and study the procession of sensitives, and evolve a philosophy which "is fearfully and wonderfully made." They remind one of the Irishman who contracted to dig a patch of potatoes for a bottle of rum. He was paid in advance, got drunk, and was sitting on a stump when the "boss" came along and reproved him. "All right, boss, fetch along your potatoes and I'll dig them." Now I have digged according to my ability—have laid myself open to the advances of spirit visitors, and in some degree speak from experience and "with authority."

I confess that I believe a great deal more than I know, and infer a great deal from known premises. As an obscure star-gazer noting the deflection of well-known bodies, by rational inference predicted the existence of an unknown star within a given radius in the heavens, whose attraction affected the orbit of the others, so may a rational mind infer much from a little experience. However that may be, my experience convinces me that "holy men of old spoke (sometimes) as they were moved by the spirit"—that often the old symbolism reflected spiritual realities and that many ceremonies and even postures were originally "from above," were natural responses to experiences akin to my own.

The philosophy of Spiritualism is eclectic, embracing what is found worthy in every system. We acknowledge truth in every system, but we cannot make a living extracting the gold held in solution in the ocean, neither can we thrive spiritually on the truth diffused in any ancient system of philosophy or record of spiritual experiences. Our ideas are not wholly new, but as the applicant for a patent bases his appeal frequently on the ground of "the combination" and simplicity of design, so do we appeal for a hearing and enunciate a new philosophy. We "show you a better way."

Those "holy men of old" confessed to seeing as through a glass darkly; of "knowing only in part" and the idea of infallibility in their exposition was never entertained by themselves. It was a dogma of the "dark ages." Their enthusiasm and sustaining hope was from the conviction that their labors would hasten the day when we should see not as through a glass darkly but as face to face; when "that which is in part shall be done away with." Every one of them in anticipation like Abraham "rejoiced to see this day and were glad." And the way to be true to Moses, Jesus, or any other great man of the past, is to imitate them in being true to our best convictions, sometimes "forgetting the things that are behind." He that putteth his hand to the plow and looketh back is not fit to be a Spiritualist.

As Moses and Elias associated with Jesus (were his guides) who labored to substitute for their old religion and philosophy a better one, so will the worthies of Judea, Egypt, Palestine, Greece and Rome, support the Spiritualist who acknowledges that if we have points of agreement with, we also have points of conflict with any and every system of preceding ages. The way to be worthy sons of illustrous sires is not to stultify reason or honest thought and discredit the "power that makes for righteousness" by making an idol of a book and reading from it in a slavish spirit—

"These are traitors to our sires
Smothering in their holy ashes
Freedom's new lit altar fires."

The man who thinks to gain a great reward hereafter by the perfunctory observance here of postures, forms and ceremonies that have lost the only virtue they ever possessed—that of suggesting spiritual realities, is the real prodigal son filling his belly with husks in a far country.

There has ever been a tide-like ebb and flow in spiritual manifestations. It is a partial truth to say that history but repeated itself when fifty odd years ago great manifestations challenged the attention of a race that for a long period had "no open vision"—no clear and positive communication with the spirit world except in obscure and isolated cases. At every previous "outpouring of the spirit" there was given a modified philosophy of life requiring a corresponding change in ceremony and ritual and a readjustment of moral or ethical ideas. With the advent of modern Spiritualism there also comes a new philosophy of life, and as we can have no omelettes without breaking eggs, neither can we give a creditable exposition of this philosophy without antagonizing what is known as Christianity as well as every system that preceded it.

It may be objected, seeing that our Spiritualism is not a mushroom growth but an evolution, that some of us are imprudent in combating orthodoxy; as the Indian youth sought to establish his manhood by publicly whipping his mother. Especially when we consider that many of ourselves and many of our spirit friends were not long ago assenters to a religion of more unreason than is taught in any popular church today. There is hardly any sect which would be soundly orthodox two generations ago. They are all drifting on the current for a more lucid and rational philosophy of life here and hereafter. A new leaven is leavening the whole lump, and that this is Spiritualism or the influence upon somewhat sensitive brains of our spirit visitors, may be argued from the fact that mediums are constantly being developed out of every sectarian fold. As an objecting clergyman said, "all the churches are honeycombed with it." If he looked carefully he would find honey in the comb.

That this philosophy appeals variously in secondary things to various minds—broad, liberal, tolerant, is proof that it is based on natural laws. Nature is ever generous. Small minds delight in the inflexible laws of the Medes and Persians. Comprehensive minds rarely draw rigid lines. They generously state broad principles. However there must be a recognition of broad principles which acknowledged in word and deed constitutes a "peculiar people," and justifies our claim to enlightenment.

Now above all things the true philosophy of Spiritualism must be simple in comparison, so that he who runs may read—like the gospel of Jesus seemed to the early Christian "mighty to the pulling down of imagination and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge, etc.".

I remember reading in the funny column of a paper at the time of the first Klondike excitement, this item: "The streets of the new Jerusalem are paved with gold, yet there is no rush there like to Alaska." From time immemorial exhorters have lamented the difficulty of sustaining enthusiasm in spiritual affairs. The orthodox philosopher accounted for this with the dogma of natural depravity. Man was conceived in sin and born in iniquity. The thoughts of his heart were evil and that continually. It may have been that the cause lay in his own incompetence, ignorance and consequent misrepresentation, but according to his philosophy all who refused to tamely bend their necks to his yoke were victims of natural depravity.

Now the Spiritualist who bewails this apathy cannot "lay that flattering unction to his soul," for upon no point does our philosophy conflict so squarely and unequivocally with that of orthodoxy as on this one, declaring that even if handicapped by prenatal and ante-natal influences, although repressed and dwarfed by misconceptions of duty and of life here and hereafter, human nature is in all its normal qualities as pure and honorable as the god or gods who said "let us make man in our own image." Nor although a thousand systems have been devised to work reform upon this principle of human depravity, and for ages to mold the human character as you shape a cheese in a cheese box, has there been a fundamental change. Though there be a vast difference between the broad, placid current of life in the highly civilized, and the narrow, violent, irregular torrent in the savage breast, this difference is essentially in the method of expression. Just as the water which flows over Niagara Falls is the same as that which meanders along the lower Amazon and obeys the same law of gravitation, so is the human nature of Bishop Potter the same as that of Cetewayo and actuated by the same basic motive. The same desires claim gratification, the same hopes allure and beneath the surface the same mighty propelling desire for happiness actuating all endeavor. Nor has any improvement been effected in accordance with the dogma of natural depravity by reversing or damming the current, but in contempt by recognizing the purity of its source and guiding the same emotions, desires, appetites, into broader and smoother channels. And after all these centuries of fear and force, of persuasion and legal insistence; after all this praying and cursing, fighting and torturing one another because Tom, Dick and Harry recognized in the other a victim of depravity and hateful in God's sight, the brightest child of to-day instead of having the appetites, emotions, desires weakened, has them enlarged and strengthened. Some irresistible force has been at work which triumphed over all the theologians and the terrifying gods or devils they evoked.

"We are the same things our fathers have been,
We see the same sights our fathers have seen,
We drink the same stream and feel the same sun,
And run the same course our fathers have run."

Not only this, but we now know that whenever and wherever an intelligent spirit appeared he manifested so far as conditions allowed the same old and reliable human nature as ourselves. If there were not this ground for mutual sympathy—this similarity of mental processes, intercourse would be impossible, and unless given conditions that allow for the natural play of this compiled mentality there is nothing more undesirable than "communion with saints," and "fellowship with angels" depends upon granting conditions for the unrestrained expression of their minds. First and foremost then our philosophy is founded on the purity of natural desire and recognizes that human nature has "come to stay."

There is, though, in this dogma the disproportioned shadow of a great truth, but a shadow distorted fearfully. If you gorge your stomach in a ten-cent restaurant you are not in condition to enjoy an Epicurean banquet. So if you are thoroughly engrossed in mundane affairs, your organism attuned to physical influences, your desires, ambitions, appetites satiated habitually with the terrestrial, you cannot be in condition to realize and appreciate the celestial—your nerves' system cannot well respond to the finer sensations of the spiritual. In this sense "the natural man is at enmity with God." Herein is the rationale of solitude, fasting, etc., and the ascetic, the recluse, the celibate, can only be intelligently restraining expression and desire on one plane with a view to their expression on another plane. He is only uprooting the affections, emotions, desires sprouted in the terrestrial nursery with a view to transplanting into a richer soil and milder climate. The fires that warm the human breast, color the emotions, quicken the intellect, are unquenchable, and denied expression on this side, will flame forth on the spiritual side. They can only die with the extinction of individuality—the "loss of the soul."

THE JASPER GATES.

Fog-rain was sweeping o'er my roses fair;
Misty darkness lay upon the land and sea;
The echo of the wind-tossed leaves that stirred the air
Called back the past, that was so sad to me.

Amid the anguish of my heart's wild pain,
An angel's symphony fell on my ear,
That seemed to breathe the song again
We sang together, sweet and clear.

As the music came in tenderest song,
My heart's wild tempest died away;
Entrancing sounds were borne along,
That crowned my soul in love-lit ray.

Harmony, truth and love must blend,
So the blissful music sang afar,
Doubt, sorrow, pain, must have an end
When the jasper gates swing wide ajar.

It whispered hope, and immortality;
It breathed of joys in glad refrain;;
Of reunions in the yet "To Be"—
When the jasper gates swing wide again.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold. Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

FACTS AND CAUSES.

The Philosophy and Phenomena of Spiritualism.

Philosophy is an explanation of causes which produce observed effects. The practical use of philosophy is that it teaches the effects which follow causes, thus enabling us to intelligently make use of causes to produce effects which we judge to be desirable.

Spirit phenomena are facts. The study of their cause is the study of spirit philosophy. Its practical use is the evidence it affords that we are spiritual beings, thus enabling us intelligently to set spiritual causes into operation with the object of producing desired spiritual effects.

The only object worthy of desire is the spiritualization of the individual. By this is meant the realization by each individual that he is spirit. This is the end and aim of spiritual philosophy. It is the one great good. It contains within itself all lesser goods. That is real good which leads each man to live for all. That which leads him to live for personalities (his own or others) is unreal, because transitory and limited good. It often appears in the guise of evil to other personalities.

By furnishing evidence of the continuity of life, spirit phenomena prove that man is spirit, that his existence is not dependent upon the preservation of the physical body, but is entirely distinct from it. They are the basis upon which the structure of spiritual philosophy must be erected.

The first essential to a good substantial building is a solid foundation. It must be founded on an immovable rock, not on shifting sands. It is of the utmost importance that when we present a philosophy for acceptance it shall be able to withstand the winds and tides of adverse criticism which will surely beat against it.

I know no better term to express the usual manner in which the phenomena of Spiritualism have been presented than to say that they have been "rushed." While theoretically we have admitted that they cannot be produced to order and are dependent upon conditions but very partially under our control, practically we have endeavored to produce them "in season and out of season," and often under conditions the most unfavorable for the purpose that could well be imagined. That we cannot have phenomena just when and where we may choose is an essential part of our philosophy. Yet we have habitually advised every investigator to go to some favorite medium of our own expecting convincing evidence, and have permitted, nay solicited, every tenth-part developed medium to exhibit his or her powers (a lack of them) from the public rostrum. The result has been as might have been expected. After receiving nothing satisfactory on dozens or hundreds of occasions, the investigator, if he should persevere a sufficient length of time, gets a genuine test, which in the light of his previous experience he accounts for on the principle that if one guesses very frequently it is not improbable that he may at some time guess aright.

To distinguish between phenomena which are genuine and those which are not is a herculean task even for advanced students. It may be comparatively easy to sift out the fraudulent, but the work is not ended there. It is a common saying among mediums that that they can only give what they get. This is true, and the knowledge that it is so should protect them from all attempts at forcing something upon them in order that they may give it out again. They give what they get, without any knowledge of where they get it from. Yet most of those who visit mediums play a double role. Unintentionally, no doubt, but none the less really they control the sensitive, shutting out all other influences, and afterwards complain that they have received nothing but that which they already knew. Or perhaps they exult at having ideas confirmed which have been inspired by themselves.

The home circle may be considered as free from motives for fraud. It is not, however, free from auto-hypnosis and suggestion from others. In addition it may lead to development of mediumship of an undesirable kind. So this also needs watchful care, patient study and sometimes very positive action to prevent ill results.

When the investigation of any subject is surrounded by difficulties and attended by some danger we should not refrain from investigating but be willing to make the necessary effort and take due precaution. We cannot produce spirit phenomena. We can afford opportunities for their production. Possibly some who may not develop mediumship may develop psychic powers of far greater value in many respects. But these would not be direct proofs of the continuity of life and should not be classed with these phenomena which are the works of the decarnate.

If there are those who in public meetings or to any large number of visitors give readings or tests which are always or almost accurate, so far from this being an evidence of mediumship it is fairly suggestive that they are not mediums at all but may be powerful psychics. Their work has value which can scarcely be over estimated. It is to prove that man is spirit here and now. Finer conditions should be secured for them that the results of their labors may be more satisfactory. They should be well trained, well educated and given every facility for close and earnest study. But they are as far removed from mediumship in the proper sense of the word as is the equator from the poles. They give nothing that can be proved to be from the decarnate. For that the medium is necessary, and that his work may be effective he should be secluded, as much as possible, from all influences from the incarnate. How to do this with our mediums is the knotty problem to solve. It would appear to have been done to a great extent in ancient Spiritualism, but in fifty-four years Modern Spiritualism has not even attempted it. In consequence we are served a compound of things past, present and future, from the world visible and the world invisible, and he must be wisely illumined indeed who can distinguish between the several ingredients.

The result is that we meet with many who after years of investigation have arrived at the conclusion that "there is something in it." What the something is they know not. Others a little less fortunate think they have discovered that there is "nothing in it." And here and there we find one who having been attracted by the philosophy before he was too much repelled by abortive attempts to produce the phenomena to order has investigated privately and been convinced of the truth by evidence at an unexpected time and through an unlooked-for channel or possibly brought in the silence to himself alone.

HUMAN WILL PERFECTED.

Contrasts in Experience Enhance Effects.

Sunshine, prosperity and happiness are a trinity sought by all humanity, but neither branch could be appreciated if unmarked by changes, adverses or sorrow. Contrast is needed to enhance their beauty, their blessings or their pre-eminence over that which stands in opposition to them.

If men were born perfect they would stand in the same relation to themselves and to each another as the foregoing implies. The struggles for eminence would not obtain, and our existence would probably become a very monotonous affair.

Perhaps that was man's primitive state, and monotony or wearisomeness led to mischief, as we know idleness does to this day—unless perfection in material conditions means stagnation and "temptation" was and is necessary for progress. If so, we certainly have an abundance of it with constant additions.

But what is temptation? One may ride over what another readily succumbs to. Thus it is difficult to draw a line. The strongest often finds his master, either by way of an influence that controls his mind or spirit, or a circumstance that controls his heart or soul.

Sensation and emotion are the subtle tempters of the unseen conditions of life—reason and love their opponents.

Spirit and soul are both very sensitive to these unseen conditions, whether they emanate from mortals or immortals, and we are often influenced beyond expectation. The brain and nervous system is the medium of sensation and consequently of reason or inspiration, being controlled by the spirit-body for this effect. The heart and blood the medium of emotion, being controlled by the soul; and love or happiness its opposing influence—its spiritual impulse.

One lends man consciousness, the other desire. The combination constitutes the will—that intelligent or conscious motive power through which he carries out his designs or enacts that which thought and desire suggest.

In the will, therefore, lies the responsibility of action, creation, effort. The prefection of action or creation then depends upon the perfection of the will, and the latter on the perfection of the sensations and emotions—imperfection being synonymous with lack of spiritual unfoldment or development; or, specifically stated, having a more energetic material or animal vibration than spiritual.

Animal sensation is that which loves the material, worldly or carnal. Spiritual sensation is inspiration or logical reasoning—inspired thought. Animal or negative emotion is that which vibrates for effects antithetical to the positive or that known as love.

The human will thus may also act for a material or a spiritual effect, according to the negative or positive vibration of sensation and ambition.

Inspiration or reason may be perfect, but pride, envy, prejudice or selfishness may govern the motive power. In that case the action will not be a perfect one. On the other hand, love may inspire the effort, but imperfect inspiration or reason spoil the action or creation. We naturally censure the first as egotistical and the latter as blundersome or absurd.

Reason must be freed from negative sensation or carnality to be perfect, as love must be from selfishness or negative emotion to be right or just.

Designing similarly develops perfect spiritual emotion or love so-called. As the former rewards with truth, the latter makes content. In combination, acting spiritually, they manifest the perfect will—influential or potent to the extent of its superior vibration over the material, or to the extent that the material or animal will is held in abeyance—controlled.

The will is therefore the master in our affairs—the law created by sensation and emotion for a material effect, and by reason and love for a spiritual effect.

To know whether our motives are perfect, therefore, we must analyze the thought and the desire that led to it. Mistakes or blunders will be the result as it is perverted by an influence vibrating for a negative or an animalistic effect, such as intemperance, gluttony, or lust might inspire; and fail or collapse comparative to the negative emotion or selfishness, envy or prejudice permitted to be infused.

Perfect unbuilding, whether for self or a cause, thus depends upon those two principles converted into a law of our own.

To be assured of success, then, we must first know how much we are governed by temptation—psychological influence, fashion, conventionality, orthodoxy, self-indulgence, preconceived opinions or notions, self-love, vanity, conceit, sensualism and selfishness (passion) generally.

Without this knowledge, too, we may be in the right—but it is safer to know it, in order to avoid blunders and failures. Of course, mistakes and calamities are great teachers and enable us to better appreciate their opposites.

Contrast aids the understanding and chisels the mind; strengthens the soul and ennobles the heart. But a contrast like that from sunshine to a destructive cyclone, may prove more of a calamity than a blessing, and such we wish to avoid. It is therefore advisable to apply the searchlight of introspection on our intentions at all times and under all circumstances, and in that be as near right as possible.

A relapse is worse than a slow and sure spiritual progress, and remorse is not conducive to happiness, even upon redemption; for humanity is less prone to forget our blunders and failures than to recall our achievements or successes. These all go into oblivion with the first cloud that darkens the sunshine of our life. Our happiness usually follows this burial, unless we have the positive will or the combined force of thought and creative energy to rise superior to psychological influence, human opinion and adverse circumstances.

But how many are independent enough to defy the world? Are we not all more or less dependent on one another for support, for sympathy, for happiness? are we not one brotherhood? Perhaps our perfection depends upon our harmonious relations with the greatest number, or our harmony in this direction points out our perfection.

Have Spiritualists reached this condition of harmony?

Relatively, yes. There is not a stronger body living believing one truth than they—aye, knowing one truth. Reason is perfected with them. One wing of their law is developed. Now, let spiritual emotion—love—govern the other, and the cause will soar above all others. Sunshine, prosperity and happiness will be theirs.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., president of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement. Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds. It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has a full page portrait of the angel heroine, from a spirit painting. Price, $1.00.

ANTIQUITY UNVEILED.

The most important revelations concerning the true origin of Christianity. Reader, in bringing to your notice "Antiquity Unveiled," it is with the sincere hope that you are earnestly looking for the truth, regardless of any other consideration. If such is the case, this advertisement will deeply interest you, and after reading this brief description you will doubtless wish to give the work a careful perusal. Price, $1.50.

MAHOMET, THE ILLUSTRIOUS.

By Godfrey Higgins, Esq. This work is one of the Library of Liberal Classics. No author was better qualified to write an impartial and honest life of Mahomet than Godfrey Higgins, and this volume is intensely interesting. It should be read in conjunction with Gibbon's work. Price, 25 cents.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

THE AGE OF REASON

By Thomas Paine. Being an investigation of True and Fabulous Theology. A complete edition of 186 pages, post 8vo. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Koran

Commonly called the "Alkoran of Mohammed." The standard Arabian or Mohammedan Bible. Cloth, $1.00

THE AGE OF REASON.

By Thomas Paine. Being an investigation of True and Fabulous Theology. A new and complete edition, from new plates and new type; 180 pages, post 8vo. Paper, 25c; cloth, 50c.

THREE SEVENS

Real Life in the Spirit Land.

Church and State.

The Bible in the Public Schools; the New "American" Party. By "Jefferson." Third edition; 28 pages. Price, 10 cents.

CONFLICT

Between Religion and Science. Just the book for progressive thinkers. A book that is very interesting to people who have a taste for the past religious history. By John W. Draper. Price, cloth, $1.75.

HYPNOTISM.

VALUABLE WORKS ON SUGGESTION.

Mental and Moral Culture.

Hypnotism in Mental and Moral Culture. By John Duncan Quackenbos, Fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, Member of the New York Academy of Sciences, Fellow of the New Hampshire Medical Society, Member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Bear in mind, please, that this book treats of Hypnotism in Mental and Moral Culture. It should be in every family. Price, $1.25.

A Complete System.

Hypnotism, a Complete System of Method, Application and Use, including all that is known in the art and practice of mesmerism and mental healing, prepared for the self-instruction of beginners, as well as for the use of advanced students and practitioners. By L. W. D. Laurence. A good work for anyone to read. Price $1. Paper, 50 cents.

The Field of Hypnotism.

Hypnotism, by Albert Moll. The author says: "Various recent researches in the field of hypnotism have rendered it necessary to remodel in part the earlier edition of the work. I have brought the history of hypnotism down to the present, and have throughout, I trust, presented the subject in its present state. In accordance with a wish which has been expressed by many, I have especially developed a chapter on the medical aspects of Hypnotism." This is a work of over 400 pages, and is certainly very valuable. Price $1.50.

Hypnotism—Its Uses and Dangers.

Hypnotism, How It Is Done; Its Uses and Dangers. By James R. Cocke, M. D. Dr. Cocke has hypnotized altogether about one thousand, three hundred and fifty people. The greater part of these were Americans, some negroes, quite a number of French, a few Germans, and a few of the Northern races, such as Danes, Russians, etc. It has been his purpose to illustrate the differences in the hypnotic state as they occur in the various nationalities, and in that respect the work is very valuable. Price $1.50.

Its History and Present Development.

Hypnotism—Its History and Present Development. By Fredrik Bjornstrom, M. D., Head Physician of the Stockholm Hospital. This being a Swedish production, it will fit into your library very nicely, though you have all the other works on Hypnotism. Price 75 cents.

The Theory and Practice.

The Theory and Practice of Human Magnetism. Translated from the French of H. Durville. The preface by the publishers is as follows: "In these days when Magnetic Healers of positive and negative ability are inflicting their courses of instructions upon the public at prices ranging from $5 to $100, courses of instructions which are neither more nor less than 'rot' from cover to cover, there is a real need for a popular work bearing upon the subject of Magnetic Healing in all its branches, from the hand of one who is at least a scholar and a master of his profession." Price $1.00.

Mind and Body, Hypnotism and Suggestion.

Mind and Body, Hypnotism and Suggestion Applied in Therapeutics and Education. By Alvan C. Halphide, M. D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in Hahnemann Medical College. Illustrated. This work treats of the Antecedents of Hypnotism; the Development of Hypnotism; the Methods of Hypnotizing; the Phenomena of Hypnosis; the Theory of Suggestion; Suggestion in the Waking State; Treatment in Natural Sleep; Clinical Hypnotism; Suggestion and Education; Danger in the use of Suggestion; Criminal Suggestion. Really, the work is very valuable. Price $1.00.

Rationale of Mesmerism.

The Rationale of Mesmerism. By A. P. Sinnett. This work, too, is worthy of great praise as it contains the results of the labors of a master mind. It treats of Old and New Theories; the Mesmeric Force; the Real Literature of Mesmerism; Side Lights on Mesmeric Phenomena; Curative Mesmerism; Anesthetic Effects and Rigidity; the Nature of Sensitiveness; Clairvoyance and Mesmeric Practice. Price $1.25.

Suggestion—A Gold Mine.

Now we present a work of marvelous utility, one that should be carefully studied. It contains a mine of valuable information. Its title is as follows: Treatment by Hypnotism and Suggestion; or Psycho Therapeutics. By C. Lloyd Tuckey, M. D. In this work, the new method, "Treatment by Suggestion," is exhaustively considered. Every branch of the subject is discussed in a masterly manner. Every healer should have it. Every physician will find it invaluable. Every one who wishes to become proficient in hypnotism will find it a valuable auxiliary in the work. Price $3.00.

Mental Suggestion From the French.

Mental Suggestion. By Doctor J. Ochorowicz, Professor of Psychology and Nature Philosophy in the University of Lemberg. Translated from the French. The ablest work, probably, ever published in France on the above subject. It is certainly very valuable, and no one can read it without having his knowledge vastly increased. The author says: "Hypnotism is henceforth part and parcel of Science, and Suggestion, which produces most of its wonders, no longer surprises us." Price $2.

An Experimental Study.

An Experimental Study in the Domain of Hypnotism. By Dr. R. von Kraft-Ebing, Professor of Psychiatry and Nervous Diseases in the Royal University of Graz, Austria. Translated from the German. This book gives the best German thought on Hypnotism. It will prove valuable in every library. Price $1.25.

If you wish to have a complete library on Hypnotism and kindred subjects, purchase the twelve books above mentioned. Indeed a single one of the volumes above named will prove of great value to every reflective mind. For sale at this office.

HARMONICS OF EVOLUTION.

The Philosophy of Individual Life, Based Upon Natural Science

As taught by modern masters of law. By Florence Huntley. An exceedingly interesting and distinctly valuable contribution to the literature of evolution, unfolding its laws from the deeper and clearer spiritual aspect, and indicating the defects of the Darwinian theory. Spiritualists and Materialists alike can gain much from its perusal. Price, finely bound in cloth, $2.

The Science of Spirit-Return.

By Charles Dawbarn. A scientific rehearsal that is truly interesting. Price 10 cents.

Stamina.

It is easier to possess too little than too much of this necessity of life.

True, other qualities and characteristics are needed towards the accomplishment of the various successes of life. For instance, to accumulate immense wealth one must have foresight, or he must have greed, selfishness and force; otherwise his wealth will have to be thrust upon him.

But to make a grand success out of one's whole life a large supply of moral and intellectual stamina is necessary.

It is not every genius who lays the plans for a great invention or scents the needs of a reform who has stamina to execute.

It was his stamina that made Martin Luther carry out the plans of his ingenious brain.

With all his tactics, wisdom, shrewdness and forethought, had not Napoleon possessed stamina he never would have been a leader of men.

In many smaller things and undertakings of life more stamina is needed, and nowhere is it more to be admired than in the ranks of a great reform movement, such as Spiritualism.

Where would have been our cause today if those old pioneer Spiritualists had not possessed stamina? When the whole world of religions, and infidels as well, was standing as a solid wall in the road of our advancement, and when Catholicism and orthodoxy stood shoulder to shoulder, almost persuaded to burn our mediums and frequently egging our speakers, could the cause have been sustained without men and women of stamina as well as brains and mediumistic qualities about them?

We are past the pioneer days, though still young, but we are not past the necessity for great stamina. In fact, with our boasted millions in membership, listed and professed, we cannot truly claim one-half the number without counting those who lack the stamina to tear themselves loose from the church and come out squarely upon our broad and comprehensive platform.

Some claiming to have "grown" beyond Spiritualism in general, have formed into little societies of their own upon the basis or principle of the "Higher Thought," with little creeds in their inside pockets, and they are included in this broad estimate of our numbers. This may require stamina for the accomplishment of anything with such societies, but it requires more for the toiling, thinking, planning and struggling speakers and genuine mediums and the Spiritualistic press to push the cause forward in advance of the great thinkers of the age, and in advance of a hungry, anxious public, in this but partially organized and equipped condition.

As Brother Hodge often says: "Could every tub stand on its own bottom," we could count the tubs and know just where we stand. But this lack of stamina is human, and yet those who lack this adjunct are ever ready to attribute their lack of affiliation to the character, the lack of true morals of a large percent of Spiritualists.

"Holy I, unholy thou," is the expression of a narrow mind, and had its birth in the hottest days of the Inquisition, and is almost obsolete so far as its oral use is concerned, but human beings are still found possessing that spirit.

Spiritualism knows no such expression and will recognize no such spirit, expressed or implied. No one has outgrown Spiritualism upon this or the other side of the grave, for it stands as a grand and noble truth that may be ingrown and may aid in growth, but cannot be outgrown.

As well say one can outgrow his own soul as to claim to be superior (that is what it implies) to Spiritualism; as well claim to be superior to life.

Spiritualists above all others, are independent and without restrictions to their power of thought, and are supposed to do a little thinking on the side, but there is no need of letting a small, one-idead fad lead them to believe they have solved the great problem of life by a mere "once one is two" illusion, or which in the light of the whole spiritual truth is later proven an illusion.

All these diversions and deviations, and all these solutions are but the arteries of life in our great spiritual body; are but the feeders and unfolders of the human-brain, the human mind that is searching the universe for its future abode, its future occupation, its future surroundings and possibilities.

We need stamina more to hold together and swing the immortal gates ajar and hold them back and show the world the continuity of life, when we have such an awful element attached to us as the great gang of imitators that continues to undo much that is done by the genuine mediums. We need stamina to attend to our own troubles and go on in the fight against prejudice and ignorance.

If every reader will take this subject home to himself and herself our cause will receive an impetus never before experienced in its history.

Is God Angry, or Is the Devil Triumphant?

This is a question that may well be asked at the present time, and which will undoubtedly be "comprehensively" answered in at least 10,000,000 different ways, by different minds—no two constituted exactly alike; no two have the same vibrations; the education of no two being precisely the same, and when early environment and heredity are brought into consideration the extreme difference in individual make-up becomes more prominent in the ratio that one considers these two leading factors.

Somebody—something—whether a he, a she, an it, a principle, a force in nature, or the unknowable and unnamable caused this terrible catastrophe at St. Pierre, where 40,000 people lost their lives.

Ever since this magnificent earth was launched in the region of space Something has been diligently at work in wrecking homes, in destroying fair cities, in murdering human beings by the thousands. Just think of the extreme barbarity and cruel torture on the part of our enemies in the Philippines in burying our soldier-prisoners alive, or puncturing the bowels and tying a portion of the intestines to a tree and then compelling the poor victim to move until he wound the entire contents around a tree, and then dropped down dead! Robert McClellan reports that these natives assassinated our soldiery by night and in the bush.

Bodies of our men were dropped in wells.
Others were hurled into swamps.
One man after being wounded was buried alive.
Others were trapped in a church, which was set afire and molten oil poured on them.
Water was poisoned and food.
Prisoners taken were starved.
Others were boloed to eternity.
Others trampled upon by oxen, the water bison.

Alas! what a horrible scene—it baffles description! It was worse than a hell; it was the refined cruelty of savages.

But we have incidents equally as bad as the death agony of some of our tortured soldiers in the Philippines, repeated thousands of times. Something is responsible therefor, just as much as if a hand were raised, and thousands stabbed to death in a moment. Here is a partial list:

GREAT DISASTERS TO HUMAN LIFE.

Date. Place	Lives lost.
Feb. 24, 79—Pompeii destroyed by eruption of Mount Vesuvius	2,000
1137—Catania, in Sicily, overturned by earthquake	15,000
1268—Cilicia destroyed by earthquake	60,000
Dec. 5, 1456—Earthquake at Naples	40,000
Feb. 26, 1531—Earthquake at Lisbon	30,000
September, 1693—Earthquake in Sicily buried fifty-four cities and towns and villages; of Catania and its 18,000 inhabitants not a trace remained	100,000
Feb. 2, 1703—Jeddo, Japan, destroyed	200,000
Nov. 30, 1731—Earthquake at Pekin	100,000
Oct. 28, 1746—Lima and Calloa demolished	18,000
September, 1754—Grand Cairo destroyed	40,000
June 7, 1755—Kascham, Persia, swallowed up	40,000
Nov. 1, 1755—Great earthquake in Spain and Portugal; in eight minutes 50,000 inhabitants in Lisbon perished; cities of Coimbra, Oporto, Braga and St. Ubes wholly overturned. In Spain, Malaga reduced to ruins. One-half of Fez, Morocco, destroyed, more than 12,000 Arabs killed; 2,000 houses in the Island of Madeira destroyed	100,000
Feb. 4, 1797—Whole county between Santa Fe and Panama destroyed, including City of Quito	40,000
Aug. 10, 1822—Aleppo destroyed	20,000
May 26, 1830—Canton, China, shaken	6,000
May 7, 1842—Cape Haytien destroyed	5,000
March 2, 1856—Earthquake in Molucca Islands	3,000
Dec. 16, 1857—Calabria, Naples, destroyed	10,000
July 2, 1863—Earthquake partly destroyed Manila	1,000
Aug. 13, 1868—Earthquake in Peru and Ecuador	25,000

This is only a partial list of the horrors of horrors that have occurred on this earth, all of which have been ascribed to a God of some kind—his nature, whereabouts and methods of action being but dimly understood and interpreted.

These calamities are often sugar coated, or so scented that they become palatable to those who collect at the various orthodox churches to hear a minister expound the gospel. They open their mouths like young birds, and gulp down whatever is told them without any reflection.

This awful calamity at St. Pierre—a holocaust unparalleled in the history of the world—whereby nearly 40,000 were compelled to suffer an appalling death—too horrible to contemplate!—will furnish a most excellent theme for sapient orthodox ministers of the gospel to consider when in vociferous tones they descant on the mysterious ways of Divine Providence.

Just as if there be anything mysterious in murdering 40,000 innocent men, women and children.

Just as if there be any Divine Providence in hurling an innocent babe into a cauldron of boiling lava.

Just as if there be any kind of a God—whether formulated in ancient or modern times—who would dash into a flame of fire a mother with her darling child clasped to her arms.

Just as if there be any God—of whatever kind—who would commit such a wholesale murder—40,000, in all, and reports not yet all in—placing this God co-equal with Filipinos who poured boiling oil on their prisoners.

The Human mind is appalled when considering this disaster, and associating a reasonable kind of a God therewith.

In speaking of this disaster the Record-Herald says:

"Human language is inadequate to express, human impotence in the presence of such an appalling calamity as that which has visited the city of St. Pierre in the Island of Martinique too feeble to convey any measure of human sympathy large enough to meet the awful suffering that must have accompanied it. Such a catastrophe almost baffles human comprehension. We think we have some conception of the distress and suffering incident to a Johnstown flood or a Galveston hurricane. We try to comprehend the horrors of drowning in midocean or of women and children being maimed and swept into eternity by a windstorm. But here was a city of 30,000 inhabitants covered with molten lava and wiped out of existence in the twinkling of an eye. No visitation in all the wide range of nature's phenomena could be so terrible as this. The hapless inhabitants of the town were literally buried in masses of fire that appeared to fall from the sky in lurid torrents. The rain of fire from the volcano of Mount Pelee swept down with such terrific suddenness and fury as to give no one an opportunity to escape. As complete as the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah was the obliteration of St. Pierre. Not only was the town of St. Pierre completely submerged with molten lava, but grave apprehensions now exist as to the safety of other islands in the vicinity of Martinique. As the volcanic dust is said to have fallen one hundred miles from the crater, it is believed that the people of Dominica and St. Vincent have suffered heavily. It now appears probable that the volcanic eruption has destroyed from 40,000 to 50,000 lives. If reports are finally and fully confirmed the destruction of St. Pierre, with its appalling loss of human lives, will surpass in awful suddenness and completeness all save the most direful disasters recorded by history."

In view of this terrible calamity would it not be well to reconstruct our views of Divine Providence?

Better have no God at all than one who gets mad.

Especially would it be better to erase that God from our list who deliberately commits murder.

A God who will throw an innocent babe into boiling lava, and then let the rotten prostitutes, thieves and robbers of all our large cities live, should be expunged from all Bibles, from all histories, from every human brain.

But the vast majority of people can only think in ruts—ruts made by the moving lips and foolish thoughts of a priest, hence this disaster will be ascribed to a great and good God.

Idiots, they!

Reflect, please, for a single moment.

Law remains supreme.

It is no respecter of persons.

It sees no difference between the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the king and the peasant, the pure and the filthy.

Cosmic forces are moving in the order of evolution, with no more regard for human beings than they have for rattlesnakes.

If the Rev. Dowie had been at St. Pierre, his prayers would have had as much effect, perhaps, as the driveling of an idiot would in putting out the volcanic fire.

Law has no feeling.

Molten lava has no consciousness.

Fire is not aware of the ruin it is causing.

The forces of nature have no eyes, no ears, no sympathy.

But under the reign of law order is being evolved out of chaotic conditions.

In primeval times there were a thousand calamities from volcanoes where there is now one.

One thing is self-evident; we must reconstruct our views of a God.

An overruling, omniscient, all-powerful God, possessed of volition would not create children for the purpose of murdering them.

Matter, spirit, cosmic forces of all kinds, have eternally existed; they are working to-day just the same as they did 1,000,000,000,000,000,000 years ago, and longer, even extending throughout the infinite past—working under a law eternally self-existing, a law that is ever moving through the process of evolution. This statement receives confirmation from the following, which appears in the Chicago Chronicle under the head,

PREDICTED BY SCIENTISTS.

Extraordinary as it may seem, the St. Pierre disaster was predicted by scientists over fifty years ago. In 1851 scientific writers declared that before another half century there would be a violent earthquake or other volcanic disturbance in the group of islands of which Martinique is the center.

There are two chief causes of such disturbances—first, volcanic explosions, and second, overloading. The St. Pierre disaster, say the scientists, was caused by the latter.

By overloading it means the carrying down of silt or sand by large rivers, thus creating an extra pressure on a certain spot of the thin surface for the earth. This increases until it makes a slight crack in the crust of the earth, causing the eruption of lava or a disaster like the earthquakes of Lisbon and Charleston.

The West Indian islands, including Martinique, were especially exposed to this danger. They are the dumping ground for all the sand silt and sediment washed down by the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, besides all the smaller rivers that flow into the Gulf of Mexico.

Very few people have any idea of the great quantity of sediment that is washed down by a large river. But a scientist has estimated that a belt line of freight cars could not haul more than half as much as the Potomac deposits at its mouth.

"What, then, shall be said of the sediment-carrying power of a mighty torrent like the Mississippi, which deposits its enormous load among the West Indies.

Every city or island near the mouth of a large river is in danger of earthquakes and volcanic explosions.

Such dangerous districts are, for instance, the land near the mouth of the River Po, into which a number of other rivers empty great quantities of silt, the Bay of Bengal, which is the dumping ground for the famous Ganges and other rivers; the Yellow sea, which empties loads of sandy deposit from the Chinese river Yang-tse, and the district around the mouth of the Amazon.

Smaller and slower rivers, such as the Hudson and Rhine, are not apt to cause earthquakes, though they are certain to do so if only given sufficient time.

The surface of the earth is very thin in proportion to its bulk. The skin of an ordinary orange, so say scientists, is much thicker than the rind of the earth upon which we tread in proportion to its size.

Any very serious alteration in the weight which rests upon this thin earth surface, therefore, is liable to cause a pressure that results in earthquakes and similar disturbances.

Every region, whether of sand or water, that lies at the foot of a large sloping territory and thus at the mouth of great rivers, is in danger of such sudden disasters as have befallen Lisbon, Charleston, Pekin and St. Pierre.

No means known to modern science can be used to avert such disasters. They are the result of gigantic natural forces, beyond all human power. No human engineer can control the fires that rage in the earth's center.

At the most, nothing can be done except to foresee such happenings and to warn the inhabitants of all near-by towns and cities that there is imminent danger in their locality of overloading and consequently of earthquakes and volcanic eruptions.

These statements from scientists divest any God or Devil of any direct responsibility in this matter.

The cause of this disaster is so plain that any one can discern the same as plainly as they can see the sun in the heavens.

Not One of the Many Gods Answers His Prayers.

She was burned by the explosion of an alcohol lamp, while she was locked in her room, preparing for an entertainment. Imprisoned in the chamber, with her hair a mass of flame, she could only scream wildly for help.

Mrs. Jane Dowie, her mother, and several of the Zion guards, responded to the alarm. Finding the door locked, they threw their combined weight against it again and again, until it fell from its hinges in splinters. The apartment was filled with smoke and a nauseous odor of burned hair, and there upon the floor, with her head wrapped in a sheet, lay Esther Dowie writhing in agony.

The faith of Dowieism—that terrible and relentless denial of science as an aid to sufferers—precluded the services of a physician. With the girl's hair burned from her head and her scalp blistered and in shreds, the frantic mother stood by in helpless despair and wrung her hands.

The attendants lifted the girl from the floor and bore her to the bed. She cried in the extremity of her pain for succor. But there was none.

In this crisis, all thoughts were turned toward the white-bearded prophet Elijah, up in Zion. While the mother prayed blindly at the daughter's bedside, a telegram was sent post-haste to the leader.

Dowie has fast horses, and a train was nearly due when he received the message. He was whirled away to the railroad station in time to catch the cars, and when he reached Chicago another carriage and more of Dowie's horses were in waiting at the Northwestern station. The trip to the Dowie home was made at break-neck speed.

Dowie hurried to the chamber where his child lay in awful pain. A sigh of relief went through the great Zion building—the home of so many tragedies, and so many sad romances.

"The overseer has come!" was passed from mouth to mouth. "He will save her."

Dowie was firm to the tenets of his preaching. He saw the fearful burns upon his daughter, but he refused to call a physician. However, he did permit the use of a salve and bandages, and when Esther's wounds were thus dressed he began to pray.

The doors were closed upon the rest of the family, and alone with the suffering girl, Dowie prayed for hours. Just what took place between the father and daughter will perhaps never be known in full, but at last the prophet and healer came out of the room. His eyes were bloodshot and his face haggard.

He had failed in the supreme test.

Dowie knew his daughter was dying.

From the accounts that have reached the outside world the room was now filled with deacons and elders and sisters of the faith of Zion. They prayed long and loud. Some threw themselves at the side of the bed, weeping and calling upon God to restore the stricken child of the leader. Fervid were the appeals that were made for a miracle, to save the young woman and to show to the world that Dowie was indeed divine.

But Esther Dowie did not hear the prayers now, for she was delirious. She struggled fiercely with the attendants, wildly trying to get up. Half a dozen attendants were necessary to hold her on the bed.

Evening came, and Miss Dowie became worse. The prayers were redoubled.

The great Zion home was ablaze with lights from basement to garret. Carriages dashed up to the entrances, and hurried away again. It was evident to outside observers that something unusual was going on.

Not until late in the evening, however, did the outside world learn the terrible secret of Dowie's Zion.

Even then the whole story of the catastrophe was withheld.

At 9 o'clock Esther Dowie had sunk into a deep unconsciousness. She was breathing heavily, but the agony of hours had left her. Dowie was still praying at her bedside.

Suddenly Esther opened her eyes and spoke. She was conscious for the first time since afternoon, and she was calm and quiet, and said she was suffering much pain. Then she closed her eyes again.

She was dead.

The above from the Chicago Journal illustrates the imbecility of this man Dowie. His prayers have no potency in such a case as this. But the semi-idiots of his flock will still adhere to him, even while his prayers meet a mocking response from the corridors of heaven. His religious belief is a travesty on common sense, while his followers are blinded by superstition and ignorance.

Eruption of Mt. Pelee.

The awfulness of the recent catastrophe in the Danish West Indies, wherein forty thousand lives were snuffed out in the twinkling of an eye, must certainly have an awakening effect upon the slumbering minds in sleepy old orthodoxy when they recount the facts that Nature is ungoverned by a special hand of Providence, and that the charred remains of the so-called saint and sinner lie side by side beneath the molten lava of the doomed city of St. Pierre, burned by the same natural element cast up from the bowels of the crater, and no amount of praying or singing, or incantations could prevent the explosion of that mountain. Water had seeped through the fissures in the rocks and come into contact with a mineral that could not affiliate with it and the consequence was an eruption.

The occurrence is appalling to the whole world, and aid is being rushed to the scene from all countries, and we are once more one common brotherhood of man.

All hearts beat in sympathy with those suffering for food, clothing and medical and surgical assistance, and all minds are turned towards the stricken human beings, with no thought of creed, race or color; with but the knowledge that our brothers and sisters are in want.

In this awful thing there is something for the ignorant, superstitious ones to think of as having come about through the wrath of God, who, in order to get at the wicked, burned many good people.

Thanks to the Age of Reason, both the book and the age, and every other cause for the unfoldment of man's reasoning faculties, these awful ideas are almost obliterated; but science sees in it something for further investigation; something to study; something the cause of which gives them a new depth to fathom. Science knows it was not thought out and executed by some Omnipotent being with a design against a few wicked people.

To those who were caught and burned alive it was a veritable hell, but to those only seriously burned and left in the form came the same suffering, or perhaps worse, for they are continuing in their agony and the dead have passed beyond it.

Let us turn from the dead to the living and help to soothe their pains and let the awfulness of the scene forever unite the world in one common brotherhood.

Political Romanism.

It is nothing new for the Romish Octupus to meddle in politics; indeed the old church has ever manifested a strong penchant in that direction, so much so that it is well known to observant students of history that as an organization it is fully as much a political as an ecclesiastical body.

During all the years of its existence, from the time of Constantine down to the present, the Romish authorities that have shaped and guided the affairs of the church, have never scrupled to plot and plan and use every device known to unscrupled ecclesiastico-politicians, to further the ends and aims, and build up and solidify the power, of the Catholic church.

No rulers' nor people's rights have been respected, if they stood in the way of Romish aggrandizement. Kings, Emperors, or other rulers and magistrates, have been compelled to bow to Romish dictation, or incur the bitter enmity of the church authorities. The Pope must be acknowledged as superior to any and all earthly potentates, who had no right to rule except as permitted by the Roman pontiff.

Luckily for the world the day of such Romish rule is past, the onflowing tide of human mental and political freedom has swept away the former prerogatives of popish power, which to-day are not acknowledged and obeyed even by most Catholic countries.

But the old ingrained spirit of political Romanism still survives, and manifests itself, now in fulminations by the head of the church, and again by priestly interference in party politics, and even in matters pertaining to the conduct and operation of state and national governmental affairs.

A few days ago, as stated by the daily press of this city, at Aurora, Ill., steps were taken by the convention of the Federation of Catholic Societies toward the organization of a "powerful combination to attend to national and state politics."

"The object of the combination is to prevent legislation derogatory to the influence of the institutions of the Catholic church and the enactment of measures by the national or state governments calculated to limit the liberties granted under the constitution. It is proposed to effect this 'combination' through the unification of the Catholic societies of all nationalities on a political basis.

"The resolutions, which were introduced by Father Hagan, of Belleville, instruct the chairman of the Vigilance Committee, Theodore B. Thiele, to place himself in communication with the various Catholic societies all over the United States, with a view to effecting the proposed organization in the early future. As the best means to accomplish this end, the resolutions recommend the union of the chairmen of the Vigilance Committees of the various state organizations into an Executive Committee, which shall be vested with unlimited powers.

"The proposed political organization will not nominate tickets, but will advise the platform makers what planks are agreeable or offensive to Catholics. It was declared in the convention that such a powerful defensive and offensive federation could bring success or defeat to either party. It is anticipated that before the next national election the reins of government will be controlled by the federation.

"It was not denied by some of the leaders that if satisfaction could be obtained from neither party eventually a Catholic national party would nominate a Presidential ticket.

"The proposed federation is expected to facilitate the organization of a labor union opposed to Socialism. Chairman Thiele, of the Vigilance Committee, declared to-day that fully 80 per cent of the union labor men in Illinois are Catholics.

"The resolution proposing the 'combination' followed closely upon the passage of resolutions denouncing the policy of the national administration, the defeat of which is admitted to be one of the motives underlying the proposition to establish the federation.

"Those resolutions described the Philippine policy of the present administration as a 'modern Christian persecution' and 'an injustice to the oppressed Catholics' and 'a shameful stigma upon our flag.' The attitude of the Governor of Guam was characterized as tyranny in that he exercised 'arbitrary powers calculated to diminish the influence of the Catholic faith on the island.' Kindergartens were described as tending to hinder Catholic education of children.

"'The child belongs in this world to its mother and for all eternity to God,' was the sense of the resolutions.

"Mayor Harrison was called an enemy of Catholics and accused of a lack of moral courage in the free text book fight, and Senator Cullom was scored for his inactivity in the Indian mission trouble."

It is merely a fresh manifestation of the old popish spirit that desires and seeks to rule every country's affairs, in the especial interest of the Catholic church. Rome is the enemy of everything that is not Romish, be it education, schools, politics, religion or governments.

Among other resolutions adopted was the following:

"Our national administration has sought by means of an irreligious educational system, conducted by sectarian ministers and Freemasons, to weaken and as far as possible to eradicate the Catholic faith in the Philippine Islands. We see in such action a crying injustice toward the oppressed Catholics, in the light of faith a modern persecution."

The only truth in this resolution is, that schools have been established there. The tenets of no creed are taught by the teachers. No creed is assailed by them. And some of the teachers are Catholics. The schools are non-sectarian, same as are the public schools of the United States. But that is sufficient reason for the Romanists to hate them—according to the church's way of thinking.

A Sign of the Times.

A striking sign of the times, and of the trend of modern scholarly thought, when not utterly circumscribed by the stultifying and mind-narrowing influence of creed, is apparent in the fact as stated by the press, that Professor Francis Brown, acting president of the noted training school of orthodox ministers, Union Seminary, recently told the graduates that the God of Abraham was an unjust God, and that modern thought, or at least New Testament thought, had been compelled to make a God of love.

The discovery of an "unjust God" as depicted in the Bible records, is nothing new, but the special meaning of the new discovery is that it should be made by a theological professor and proclaimed before a class of theological graduates. It may set some of them to thinking.

MOUNT PELEE

Hark! Do you hear that awful wail that comes from over the sea?
'Tis the cry of a deep, dark horror befalling humanity;
'Tis the cry of human beings upon whom calamity fell;
'Tis the cry of those escaping from a veritable hell!

Drowned by that roaring furnace, comes a pitiable cry!
Lift up your hearts, oh, ye people! Lift up your souls for a spell,
And lighten the anguish of beings in this veritable hell!

Comes the sad call: "Oh, please help us, or to perish we are doomed!"
Comes forth the groans of deep anguish, deeper than tongue can tell,
Up from the depth of a crater, as from a furnace of hell.

DR. T. WILKINS.

Gleams and Foregleams.

Slowly, carefully, hesitatingly, with laborious painstaking to secure indubitable results, science is reaching a definite position pertaining to Spiritualism. It is well that the progress should be slow, and the results attained thereby be made sure and well fortified with known facts and keen experiment.

Never has psychology so engrossed the attention of the world as at the present. The soul, in its earthly embodiment and after, occupies the thought of the world and the study of scientists to a degree never before known or even possible.

The multifarious manifestations of Spiritualism have forced the world, unlettered and scientists alike, to think, and an interest has been excited and a spirit of inquiry awakened, that forebodes great advance in knowledge pertaining to spirit existence and spirit relationships. This will result, and is resulting in progress in our knowledge of spiritual things.

Spirit manifestations are increasing in number and variety, challenging the awakening impulse of research and appealing to the interested minds of enquirers. Many families have experiences of the visits of dear ones whose bodies have with tears been committed to mother earth, which they keep within their own hearts, for fear of being accounted mentally unbalanced by their neighbors; but the new experience has sufficed, with them, to rob death of its terrors, and in their hearts they are Spiritualists, giving glad welcome to the new-found knowledge of spirit continuity and return.

In some is developed the gift of clairvoyance and they are enabled to see the "departed" stand with hands outstretched in gesture of welcome or invitation; in some the spiritual sense of hearing is made acute to hear the spiritually spoken words of love and cheer.

These things, these occurrences, are known and the knowledge is floating everywhere, the mental atmosphere is thus surcharged with the knowledge of Spiritualism, and the new thought engendered is full of vital meaning, to which the world, if it would, cannot be indifferent. Science cannot ignore the facts with which it is thus surrounded and enveloped; it cannot afford to even appear to be indifferent, for to do so would entail loss of prestige, loss of respect, and loss of influence.

Thus are the things of spirit being surely and definitely brought within the scope of scientific inquiry, and with the resultant broadening of scientific knowledge the spiritual vision will enlarge, and vaster expanses of truth will open to our expanding perceptions.

New glories may be expected to open to perpetually surprised eyes, and Spiritualism will go on from triumph to triumph, bearing the message of light and joy to all humanity.

The Relation Science Holds to Natural Philosophy; and Its Conflict with Every Phase of Religion. — An Essay — Philosophical and Scientific, on an Important Subject.

Written by Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood.

The numerous discoveries made by scientific investigation during the last quarter of a century, have so far made its inductions popular, that now every divergent system of belief within the domain of sociology would fain employ it in verification of their respective claims. Nothing is more common than to hear an advocate of a dogma or creed cite an induction of science in confirmation of some creedal claim postulated in the domain of the unknowable, which postulate if accepted, will have a tendency to impress the popular mind with the data and proportions of a scientific proof in the conclusions reached. The avidity and eagerness with which all of these assumptive speculators will grasp at a scientific thought when it seems to promote the truthfulness or strength of their claim, is only equaled by the unqualified zeal with which they will repudiate both science and its formulas, whenever its inductions are antipodal to, and refute their claims The prevailing looseness with which this class of superficial thinkers employ the term, is manifest in the fact that it is constantly referred to as a schism, and in an individualized sense, when in reality the term science is a general term applicable to those formulas of research by which every branch and department of human knowledge is established. Hence it is the name of a method by which natural philosophy as a sequence to scientific investigation is verified; and being the name of a method of verification, it cannot be at the same time the name of the fact which it demonstrates.

SCIENCE AS CLASSIFIED.

One writer affirms that "science is classified knowledge." Another, that "science is reasoned truth;" and another that "science is the knowledge of nature, its laws and functions;" and still another affirms that "science and religion will, when man becomes spiritually unfolded, be seen to be one and the same."

To all of this vague and inconsistent statement we shall enter a most hearty protest. "Science is a system of inductive and deductive reasoning. It is a formula of demonstration, as applied to the inductive method, and of syllogistic reasoning as applied to the deductive; hence it can never be employed as a synonym for knowledge, philosophy or truth, since it is only the method by which knowledge and truth are established. To illustrate: Mathematics in its application, is the science of quantity; but quantity, per se, is not science, but the result of mathematical deduction as applied to processes of reckoning quantities. A lumberman's rule is a scientific mechanism, so figured as to enable the dealer to tell at a glance when he lays it upon a board or stick of timber, the number of square or solid feet contained in the lumber thus measured. But the rule itself is not science; neither is the pile of lumber measured science; nor is our knowledge of the square feet in the pile of lumber science, per se, since our knowledge is the result of a system of scientific measurement. Electricity is measured in volts of energy and ohms of resistance; but neither volts, ohms, nor electricity is science, since volts and ohms are only units of measurement, and electricity the energy measured.

CHEMICAL COMBINATION.

Chemical combination depends upon the reciprocal polarity of combining molecules, reckoned in volumes; but neither the volumes of the elemental energies that enter into the combination, nor their molecules or the compound evoked, can be termed science, since chemical science is the system of analysis by which our knowledge of chemical data is made known by demonstration. These facts being in evidence, it will be seen that knowledge is the synthesis to scientific analysis; the result of inductive and deductive reasoning. By the term "scientific knowledge," we mean that superior order of understanding and comprehension which scientific analysis only can educe.

THE ELEMENTS.

The invisible and primary motion belonging to, and individualizing each element of nature is at first only known through or by the phenomena of its actions and reactions in combination with other elements; yet these phenomena have been so accurately tested and classified, that to-day the progressive physicist points out seventy-two, possibly seventy-four elements that enter into and become factors in the visible and invisible processes of cosmic evolution.

FLIPPANT LOOSENESS.

It is the especial sphere of the student and experimentalist in scientific research, to deal directly with the invisible attributes of nature, through the phenomena of the visible. His thoughtful intellect first suggested the term, "modes of motion" as applicable to that invisible relation which one element or factor of nature holds to another; also to suggest that the ganglia of conscious sensation in man, are only avenues through which invisible methods of impressing his consciousness connect him to his environment. The flippant looseness with which the popular mind refers to science as the name of knowledge, instead of the method by which the data of knowledge and truth are established, and the reckless disregard they manifest for the real facts upon which the scientific intellect builds, is open evidence that their acquaintance with the formulas of science begins with a desire to conserve the name of scientific synthesis when it can be warped into the seeming support of some individual or popular schism, and ends with zealous disregard for anything scientific, when it is antipodal to their claim, or no longer conserves their speculative interests. Let us amplify this fact.

After being taught in school that nature is a unit—that all of her forces and energies are eternally co-related; after listening to the declarations of learned pulpiteers that the entire universe is a vast system of harmony, a modern writer makes this counter statement. In speaking of Spiritualism he says: "Spiritualism is truly a science. Mathematics is not more surely fixed as a science than is the science of life here and hereafter, called Spiritualism." "But," this writer goes on to say, "it is a spiritual science differing from natural science as widely as spiritual things differ from material things." So, if the assertions of the writer are valuable, "nature is not a unit;" and the universe is not a vast system of harmony, since it includes two antipodal systems of science; the one for the material, and the other for the spiritual world. Now the opinion of this writer, however opposed it is to the inductions of natural philosophy, will find a warm response in the mentality of public opinion. That cosmic science has nothing to do with spirit or spiritual things, still lingers in the popular mind, a relic of past forms of thought, as instructed in the days of Calvin and Cotton Mather.

THE MENTAL TANGLE.

Here is another pen picture of the mental tangle that a modern writer gets into when affirming the incompetency of scientific method to deal with spiritual things. The writer lays down the two following postulates, both of which are incomplete and erroneous, and contain in their application grave inconsistencies. The writer affirms in postulate No. 1: "Science is the knowledge of nature, its laws or functions." Postulate No. 2: "Spirit is nature manifesting in these laws or functions." Affirmation. "To test the higher by the lesser is effort misapplied—the reverse of cause and effect."

If spirit be considered the higher, and science the lesser, then applying postulate No. 1, we analyze that to test nature (which is spirit in manifestation) by science (which is our knowledge of nature), is effort misapplied. In other words, to test nature by knowledge, "is the reverse of cause and effect." Most unfortunate are these postulates that both admit and deny the central proposition; for it will be seen that if science is knowledge of nature, then science is knowledge of spirit and its manifestations, and to the extent of this knowledge, science has compassed spirit and tested the higher. Here is another paragraph of the same kind of reasoning.

"If there is that which is beyond science, and there is the great realm of super-consciousness in human existence, that realm can take possession of science, can make science its handmaiden."

The realm that is "above," "over," or "beyond" consciousness as applied to lack of knowledge of cosmic processes, is ignorance. That the realm of ignorance can take possession of science is not true; that it has tried and still is trying to possess it, seems true, as it witnessed in the terms "Christian Science," "Occult—(obscure)—Science," and the like; but that it can make science its handmaiden is doubtful, since it seems more inclined to make it a mop.

TALKING UP A VACUUM.

But however quaint and incongruous these postulates and paragraphs cited are, and in what beggarly states of incompetency the author attempts to leave science, we can agree that all such talkers and writers "about the scientific demonstration of Spiritualism, are simply talking up a vacuum." Indeed, we might say with a great degree of truthfulness, that all such talk and criticism of science emanates in a vacuum. It will be a day of real emancipation of man from the fogs of ecclesiasticism—a real awakening from the hypnotic slumber of theological suggestion, when all of these expositors of ancestral beliefs become sufficiently awake mentally to sense the intellectual poverty of their methods of reasoning, and the tattered and torn logic with its sequences, with which they seek to cover and bolster up individual opinion, or some remnant of oriental phantasy. Eyes have they, but evidently they have not read that fully twenty-four hundred years ago the philosophic intellect of that time declared the spirituality of all elements and substances of which matter is composed, which affirmation has never been disproved, but grows more luminous with the discoveries of modern time. Ears have they, but they seem dead to the fact that in nearly every college in the civilized world a chair is endowed to instruct that all nature and her processes are eternally co-related by invisible formula called "modes of motion." These facts being in evidence, we affirm that science does not deal with material things in the general sense in which that term is understood, but with those invisible energies and elements which the thinkers and philosophers of every age have called spiritual. Hence in exact language there can be no such thing as "a material science;" but we do have sciences of the formation of matter. Neither do we have "physical science;" but rather sciences of the evolution and development of physical organization. Besides these self-evident facts, science itself, in any and all of its applications is a formula of intellectual sequences; therefore cannot be material or physical in the sense claimed.

VIEWS IN REFERENCE TO GOD.

No one ever saw the life principle of oxygen or hydrogen, or that of any element or compound or form of existence, as they are invisible spiritual entities, and are known to the physicist as life energies. It is a ludicrous commentary on the consistency of thought of these critics of science, who affirming "God as the first great cause," "The Infinite Intelligence" "who created the world and all cosmic process out of his Holy Spirit," that he—God—should have made a visible world; that he gave to oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, and all other elements of nature their respective life motions and established their combining proportions, that every form and type of life was "a spiritual design;" and yet this God, this "First Great Cause," this "Infinite Intelligence," is accused in all of these loose criticisms, of being "A MATERIALIST," and the author of materialism. He is accused of creating the visible universe of material things. Poor God! We feel sorry for him—thus to be libeled and lied about, if he is the author of the universe, by those who claim to worship him in spirit and in truth. Strange spirit of criticism that reflects the authorship of materialism upon God who is claimed to have made all things from spirit by the omnipotence of design! What an uncertain and irregular ideal of "truth" and consistency of thought to affirm God as a spirit, and that cosmos and its processes were made and evoked by his "Holy Spirit," and then to denounce in dogmatic terms the materiality of its visibility and co-relations.

INFINITE INTELLIGENCE.

Just to think, what a tremendous throb of spiritual volition is required on the part of the credulous penitent to make him believe that God, the Hebrew Jehovah, made infinitude in six days of the pagan calendar; he also made self-existing principles called laws; he made twice two four; he established the theorems (self-existing principles) of mathematics; and the equations (the polar balance of combining molecules) of chemical physics. More than all of this, he established the combining proportions of the heterogeneous spiritual substances of which God is like, and in which he is,—all of this must be believed. What a constant, prayerful, religious self-hypnotism is required to keep the believers' faith in the possibility of these assumptions. And then to have pulpit and pew malign God for making a materialistic world out of his own spiritual substance, is, to say the least, unpardonable, and a libel upon "Infinite Intelligence."

How inconsistently and questionably the human glorifies and honors his God, by claiming "a material science for the material world" which he affirms God made, and "a spiritual science for a spiritual world," out of which his God made the material universe. This almost universal method of imputing the crudeness of materiality and material things to God, comprises the fundamental idiosyncrasy of religious worship and belief. No wonder that Voltaire should say that, "One of the lovely proofs of religion is that it is unintelligible." When the critics and scoffers of science can get out of this rut of inconsistency, when they are no longer in mental conflict within themselves as to the relation of the invisible to the visible in cosmic process; when they are able to disentangle themselves from the mental dilemma they are in by assuming that God's spirit as a motion of omnipotent energy is in no way related to matter except by the domination of miraculous power; when they cease to assume "material laws for material things," and "spiritual laws for spiritual things;" when they can free their intellect from all of this rubbish of pagan concept and modern superstition, they will at least cease to traduce their God by reviling the material world which they affirm he made.

PSEUDO SCIENTIST.

The term, "pseudo scientist," whoever or whatever is meant by it, seems to be a common and convenient club in the hands of this constituency, to belabor and malign all those who favor the scientific method of investigation, and who oppose the assumptive arrogance of an illiterate and dogmatic theism. The use of the term in this connection however is a most unwise selection, but it fully indicates the lack of erudition and cogent common sense of those who employ it.

The term "Pseudo" is from the Greek; and means, "lying" and "false." As these critics apply it to science or to a scientist, it is a paradox. In the correct use of words and their application there can be no such thing as a "false science" or a "lying scientist," so far as the term science applies to methods of demonstrating truth and knowledge. A man is not a scientist until he demonstrates truth; and in the demonstration of truth, he is not a liar.

A PSEUDO TEACHER.

But unfortunately for our critics the term does apply with a strong emphasis to false and lying teachers and instructors; and we will submit that any cleric or teacher who instructs that God or Infinite Intelligence was the creator of Infinitude, is in every sense a pseudo teacher. Any cleric or instructor who affirms that in the cosmic order of time a God or Infinite Intelligence can be or is Infinite, is a pseudo instructor, since God or Infinite Intelligence has not existed to-morrow. Therefore we affirm that any God known to the canvas of time and the human imagination that depends upon the never-ceasing ticks of the clock of time for his unperfected infinity is as finite in the processes of time and in the duration yet to be, as any existence of time and space. And we furthermore submit, that any teacher or class of people who affirm God as the spiritual cause of all cosmic process, who instruct that matter which they claim God made, is "dead," and "crude," and "inert," thereby assuming that to this extent God's spirit is dead and crude and inert, and that his effort to make matter out of his spirit died in the material, not only vilify and traduce the spiritual omnipotence of the God they profess to believe in and worship, but they are the greatest infidels of the age, since all chemical experiments demonstrate that there can be no such thing as crude and dead matter.

The antipodes are no further away from their opposites, than is the realm of cogent reasoning from the sphere of this ignorance and mental perjury.

THE HUMAN MIND.

It is this class of pseudo teachers, who are continually berating what they call the "finiteness of the human mind." Mind is the mental expression of the soul; and if it can be proven as our critics claim that the soul came from God, then it is as infinite as God. If it be held that the soul is an evolution, then it is as infinite in duration as the factors that evoke and sustain it, and its province as a progressive entity is to discover more and more of infinitude, hence in no sense is this clerical criticism true. Man's mind and intellect is limited in knowledge and in its capacity to acquire it, but as a progressive soul, man is not finite. These pseudo teachers not only instruct the finiteness of the human mind, but they continually criticise in terms of moral obloquy what they call "man's physical senses," seeming to be entirely oblivious to the fact that in the constitution of man as a spiritual ego, he can have no such thing as a physical sense; for the reason that all sensations emanate in the realm of consciousness; and consciousness is a sentient attribute of the soul. The avenues and tracts of the sensory system connecting the external world to human consciousness may seem to be physical in their visible aspect, but their functions are of psychical character, since these tracts convey only invisible modes of molecular motion to man's consciousness, which upon being impressed has sensation in accord with the molecular structure of the avenue through which the sensation is evoked.

TUTELARY GODS.

The states of mental hypnosis upon the public mind in consequence of adherence to ecclesiastical beliefs, in connection with the prevailing ignorance of the cerebral relation of man's conscious principle to methods of sensation and the general formulas of knowledge, give opportunity for all this class of pseudo instructors to belittle not only mankind, but even the very avenues through which only he can have knowledge of his environment. It seems almost incredible that anyone, claiming to accept the inductions of science and the higher life, can continue to stake their morals upon the Bible of an adulterous age, and the claimed miracles of its numerous Gods. While affirming the central postulates of evolution, they instruct as the basis of literary ethics, the Mosaic theory of creation. Assuming in private and public the inductions of geology and archeology as proof of the great antiquity of man, they continually refer to the Bible Adam as a fact. With the history of the various systems of theogony (the gods) of the nations of the past in every public library, they claim Jehovah—the Hebrew Yahve—a national and tutelary god of the Jews, as the Creator and First Great Cause of cosmos. All tutelary gods and deities were the spirits of deified men, and are so accounted in all history and mythology. Now when any thinker refuses to believe that the spirit of a deified man made the heavens and the earth, he is met with the epithets of "atheist," "infidel," "materialist," etc.; as an expression of public and personal contempt on the part of those in sympathy with this god of pagan idolatry. That science as the formula of inductive and deductive reasoning can gain the recognition of those under the cloud and in the toils of this hypocrisy and hypnosis will be rare phenomena. Whenever a man's zeal is so great that he can ask you to perjure your intellect in the acceptance of the principles of his faith, such zeal is greater than the man's moral convictions of the value of truth. Science has always been of questionable value in the realm of religious faith. Indeed, we can say with the greatest truthfulness, that religious zeal and faith unfit a man to be a student of science, for the reason that with belief and faith established a mind is disqualified to investigate those facts which have a tendency to dethrone his faith.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Religion postulates an unknown and unknowable God, either anthropomorphic, spiritual, or cosmic, yet possessing individualized intelligence and personal designs, infinitely diffused through space and expressed in matter, as the "First Great Cause" of infinitude—of that which has always existed.

Science postulates the eternal invisible elemental energies of nature, infinitely co-related by principles of polar attraction and repulsion, with an inherent tendency to evoke higher forms of existence in the evolution and development of all cosmic phenomena.

Religion affirms its God or First Great Cause as an intelligence outside of matter, that molds it into form.

Science affirms that the power and potency to evolve all forms of matter and types of life inheres in the elements of nature and in their combining processes.

Religion claims matter to be "dead, crude and inert;" necessitating an omnipotent power with special designs to create forms of matter, and types of life.

Science demonstrates that every molecule of the active principle of all known elements is an energizing life principle, which in its various spheres of combination evokes form and life of infinite variety of expression.

Religion affirms God as the First Great Cause as beyond nature and superior to it, therefore supernatural.

Science affirms nature to be self-existent and eternal; hence there can be no supernatural.

Religion pictures its God as possessing the characteristics and features of man with pro-creative function and capable of being pleased and displeased.

Science sees no form or features of an anthropomorphic God, or of a First Great Cause in the analysis of Cosmic factors—it recognizes only co-related elemental energies, each of which is omnipotent in its sphere of action.

Religion formulates the term "Law," as the edict, command, or volition of its God, in the control and continuation of cosmic processes.

Science affirms "eternal principle" as the order of nature, the factors of which were never made, nor can they be changed.

All religions are based upon the concept of the duality of matter and spirit.

Science postulates "spiritual infinitude," the elements of which are manifestations of an infinite variety of primordial spiritual substances, each of which so far as is known has its own individual polarity, which fact is ascertained by its action and reaction in combination with other elements. Hence the student in scientific physics affirms the eternal unity of spiritual elements and matter, matter being the product of the spiritual elements of nature, in combination.

Religion affirms that God molds matter into form.

Science demonstrates that the elements of nature combine upon a plane of "polar resistance," which means that elements resist combination until their individual polarities are mutually overcome by the action of other element or elements upon them. With reciprocal polarities mutually changed, a new system of polar combination is evoked, bringing with it and inducing the phenomenon of the compound. Science affirms that this combining process does not depend upon a God acting from without or within the combining molecules, but upon the mathematical and polar relation and amount of each of the combining elements by weight or volume. Upon the unvarying integrity of the data of chemical combinations are established the principles of the Chemical Balance and Chemical Equations, and the application of these cosmic principles demonstrates nature to be automatic and self-existent. The facts upon which the equational character of nature is established had their inception in the experiments of the immortal Lavoisier and Sir Humphrey Day; and with other facts subsequently discovered have been voiced in treatises on Chemistry and taught in schools, academies and colleges for nearly a hundred years, and are still being taught; while the infidels in the pulpits, the pseudo teachers on the rostrum and a large element of civilization "false" to the inductions and demonstrations of its own colleges and universities, continue to recite the errors and sophisms of ecclesiasticism and to accept its sorcery of the forgiveness of sin, its ordinations, consecrations, dedications, and installations, platitudes and formula of pagan idolatry when its systems of theology and theogony, and its religion consisted in the worship of its idols Phallus and Yoni. That these low and sensuous ideals introduce Christianity and its ecclesiastical hierarchy, is witnessed in the recital by the evangels regarding the birth of Jesus.

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT.

The historical fact that "Constantine the Great," a born pagan who was titled "Pontifex Maximus," "Emperor and Supreme Dignitary of the Pagan Hierarchy," who lived and died a pagan, issued an edict in the year 321 changing the day of pagan worship from Saturn's-day to Suns-day, and another edict in 325 calling in convention the Nicene Council which fastened upon future generations the story of the phallic incest of one of the tutelary gods of the Jews as is testified in the tradition in the New Testament of the "immaculate conception" of Jesus, is historical and logical proof as strong as the testimony of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, of the pagan origin of ecclesiastical dogma. The same Nicene Council issued a canon uniting in holy communication the festival of the phallic divinity Eastre, worshiped by the ancient Celts, and the festival of Beletine (Baael worship) as practiced in the north of Germany, and our modern Easter, all and each of them of phallic origin. Let the thinker think. The fact that these monstrous dogmas have given birth to 328 distinct hybrid religious schisms, each with its salaried priests and sign-boards pointing out "the only true way," and each proclaiming "the gospel of glad tidings," that "I am the only true way"—"all of the rest are infidels, heretics and sinners," is further evidence of their pagan origin, and of their persistent adherence to pagan methods of demonstrating the superiority and divinity of their respective religions.

That continuity of life can ever be established and proven by any of these ridiculous schisms, is an inconsistent sophism. That the time will ever come when science and religious platitude will be one and the same, is the idle dream of intoxicated religious zeal.

THE SUPERNATURAL.

All religions deal with the supernatural. Science investigates only the natural. All religions include faith in the mythical, the wonderful and the miraculous. Science repudiates the miraculous and the metaphysical, and resorts to thorough and consecutive analysis before it presents its truths. Religion asks only blind adherence to faith. Science demands demonstration. A religion that contains an unknowable postulate, is antagonistic to scientific investigation and analysis. As all religions known to the page of history and modern thought, do contain unknowable factors, there can never be a scientific religion. Spiritualism in its synthetic analysis has none of the features of religion; for the reason that its premise established in the infinite spirituality of all of nature's forces, affords an orderly and logical analysis of the natural features by which we demonstrate in precise sequences the philosophy of the evolution of the soul of man as a progressive entity of nature. Hence its philosophy is capable of the most careful analysis, while its synthesis will be found to be composed of logical sequences containing precise data.

In a general sense Spiritualism is the philosophy of the possibility and capability of the spirit of the human after its disembodiment, to make its individuality manifest to those still in the form. Not only this, but it demonstrates how this mental association takes place, by an analysis of the natural co-relation of all cosmic elements and forces, which must include mental, cerebral and conscious modes of motion. While Spiritualism contains none of the features of religion, its system of synthetic ethics transcends in beauty and eloquence of thought the progressive possibilities of the human soul in the realm of spirit life, far beyond that voiced in any religion, or outlined by mortal pen. Its representatives are too progressive in intellect to consent to worship forever at the throne of a pagan god who can be pleased with the adulations and praise of ignorant humanity.

The gods of all religious cults are relics of a mythological and traditional past, and although voiced in Bibles and so-called Sacred cosmogonies they had their origin when it was customary to deify great men and claim their spirits lived in the Sun, Moon and Stars of Heaven, and to perpetuate their memories by voicing their caprices, passions and revengeful natures. Read the history of the fierce and revengeful character of the Jewish Jehovah as portrayed in the pentateuch, and his tutelary nature will be seen in every chapter.

These gods of a sensuous past are fast disappearing before the search-light of science and archaeology, and giving place to the broader and wiser view that nature is infinite in extension, automatic in its functional character, therefore will be unending in duration.

The intelligent Spiritualist and thinker argues that infinitude could not be infinite in capacity, unless its spiritual elements possessed all of the omnipotence and possibilities expressed on the canvas of time in cosmic evolution.

AS TO FIRST CAUSE.

This omnipotent power and function of Infinitude in cosmic process, he offers in place of that which a pagan age ascribed to its numerous gods, and a modern theology so illogically represents in a "First Great Cause," or an Overruling Power. The consistent thinker affirms that there can be no First Cause to that which has eternally existed, or an Overruling Power in the infinitude of co-related forces—such thought and claim is assumptive, inconsistent, dogmatic and infidel to the inductions of universities, colleges and a scientific age.

The Saviors of Spiritualism are those who extend the boundaries of human knowledge and brush away from the intellect the fogs and nightmares of ancestral superstitions. Its "all-seeing eye" is the demonstration that all factors of nature, all modes of motion have a polar and mathematical relation to its phenomena, hence mental modes of motion contain vibrations reciprocal and polar to other mentalities; and this principle is universal.

The patriarchs of Spiritualism are the unnumbered dead, who in their time discovered truths before unknown and laid them upon the altar of human progression. Its apostles are all those in every clime who are continuing to make new discoveries in the various avenues of the sciences of cosmos, and who thus labor to make the to-morrow of mankind wiser and better. Its code of morals is good health, reciprocal justice for the here and now, and a thorough knowledge of human environment. Its rewards, a growing realization of the possibility of human improvement during man's life on the earth plane, and continued existence and progression in a life beyond the grave—nature's own free gift to every son and daughter of mankind.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of nurists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. Call or write us about your case. We give advice free and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Prof. Wilson's 100-page Dictionary of Disease, Free. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adherd to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt may be addressed for camp or society engagements, at 408 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill., or at The Progressive Thinker office.

Harry J. Moore who has proved a great favorite at Rochester, Ind., as a lecturer, will respond to calls to attend camp-meetings. Address him at No. 773 Sixty-third Place, Englewood Station, Chicago, Ill.

The Indianapolis (Ind.) Sentinel says; "The executive board of the Indiana Spiritualist Association has decided to open the Spiritualist camp-grounds to the public on Sundays during the month of June. A good speaker will be here every Sunday during the month, the first being Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, of Chicago. Work on the auditorium has proceeded rapidly and the structure is now almost finished."

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley had excellent audiences at Waco, Tex. Mrs. Cooley is one of the best test mediums now on the rostrum.

Detective Patrick Duffy's death at the hands of two highwaymen was foretold to the policeman in a dream two nights before he fell with a bullet in his brain. His widow told the story to a reporter for the American last night. It is best told in her own words with the statement that Duffy was shot by one of two men whom he tried to arrest at Forty-sixth street and Emerald avenue on the night of May 1. One of these men, Hugh Reilly, is under arrest. The police believe he did the killing, but he throws the blame upon Vincent Briscoe, with whom, he says, he was at the time, and who has disappeared from his home 5614 Union avenue, since the shooting. Mrs. Duffy said: "My husband was never a superstitious man. He seldom dreamed and he never paid any attention to the dreams he had except this one. It was Tuesday night. He was in bed. He was very tired and was sleeping soundly, I thought, when he suddenly sprang out of bed. His face was bathed in perspiration and he was trembling. 'What is the trouble?' I called to him. 'I have had an awful dream,' he said. 'I dreamed I was on my beat last night and that I saw two men lurking in the shadow of a building. It was my business to find out who they were, and I walked toward them. As soon as they saw I was a police officer one of them fired at me. I felt a sharp pain in the head, and as I fell to the ground I saw before me a church steeple.' The dream impressed itself upon Duffy's mind and the next day he told other policemen about it. Neither they nor Mrs. Duffy regarded it seriously. But now they incline to the opinion that there was a touch of the supernatural in it. They say that the fact that in his dream Duffy saw the steeple of a church is significant, because it was before a church he was murdered.—Chicago American.

John D. Wilson writes: "If a man die shall he live again? As an answer to this great question, we simply say that we have no belief or faith in the matter; but we personally know of our own knowledge that man continues to live after what we call death. To die is but to fall asleep and wake up in a new state of existence. What we call death is simply a change of life."

H. E. Pomeroy writes: "In The Progressive Thinker dated May 17, on the second page, appears an article signed J. S. Loveland. I write simply to endorse and commend said article."

Mrs. Henrietta L. Lichtig has removed from Springfield, Ill., to 3154 Calumet avenue, Chicago, and is recommended as a psychic of ability and devotion.

G. W. Kates and wife want all to notice that their permanent address is 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C. Address them there and mail will be forwarded.

Jud Johnson writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "I see an account in The Progressive Thinker of May 17, under the name of G. R. Bicknell, that Henry Slade was in Battle Creek, Mich., a physical wreck. That is a mistake, as he is now at my home, 65 Maude avenue. He has been in this city since early last fall, and with me since March 23. He has been a physical wreck, but is much better now, but not able to write as he has but little use of his right arm. His psychic powers are as good as ever. He gives slate-writings in bright light every week, with the best of satisfaction. If anyone wishes to know more in regard to him, I will answer all inquiries if a stamp is sent for return postage."

Mrs. C. W. Judd writes: "I think The Progressive Thinker the greatest paper on earth. It is a welcome visitor. The premium books I prize very highly."

Frank T. Ripley, who is lecturing at Erie, Pa., has the Sundays of June and July open for engagements. Terms liberal. Address all letters to him at Erie, Pa., care of General Delivery.

Lucy S. Carroll writes from Wheeling, West Va.: "The First Progressive Spiritual Society of Wheeling feels very proud to realize that we are a link in this great line of thought, and in harmony with the inspiring influence of our noble speaker, Nellie S. Baade, of Detroit, we know great good can be done. She gave a lecture last Sunday evening on the Difference Between Spiritism and Spiritualism. She handled that subject most beautifully."

Dr. J. M. Peebles writes from Dunedin, New Zealand: "You see by date of this that I am in Dunedin, in the very southernmost part of New Zealand, and pretty well on towards the Antarctic circle, where at noon the sun is north of me, and the southern cross glitters in the southwest at night. I am lecturing every Sunday and two or three times a week, and I was never in such demand for lectures, for I have received several since leaving home wanting me to attend state associations or camp-meetings this coming summer. I find much inharmony here among Spiritualists, upon reincarnation, and other subjects. The Theosophists seem sectarian and even bitter towards Spiritualists. I can hardly understand it. I go from here to Wellington, the capital of New Zealand, to fulfill an engagement, and then start homeward by way of London. Find enclosed an article for your stirring, wide-awake weekly." This article will appear next week.

The Pittsburg Leader has the following from Cincinnati, Ohio: "As a result of the answer of John Murray Case, inventor, manufacturer and author, filed in the Superior Court to-day, the injunction involving the J. M. Case mill works has been turned into a veritable battle of Spiritualism. Case has alleged that Mrs. C. A. Smith, of 410 East Third street, wife of the vice-president of the company, has been influenced in bringing suit and continuing to press it by her 'spirit control, George,' and by Spiritualistic mediums. Mrs. Smith, through her attorneys, Bates and Mercer, claims that Case is dominated by a 'spirit control, Yam, an Oriental.' This unseen adviser, Mrs. Smith claims, furnished the inspiration for Case's numerous inventions, some of which are involved in this suit." Mrs. Smith, in her suit, demands that Case turn over to the company several patents. Case and his wife both say they are Spiritualists, but that they only believe in the higher Spiritualism. 'Every man who accomplishes anything is inspired,' says Case. 'But 90 per cent of the so-called spirit mediums and spirit seances are frauds and fakes of the first water. But I do not see how any believer in the Bible can fail to believe in Spiritualism. Several instances of persons "inspired by the spirit" are cited in the New Testament.' "

Mrs. A. C. Steger writes from Michigan: "I received a book from the office of The Progressive Thinker last year entitled Apollonius of Tyana, for which receive my sincere thanks. I have read it through from cover to cover and find it intensely interesting. I don't know how anyone can help but believe that each communication is from the spirit world, as the most of them agree so closely with ancient history. I have now quite a library of Spiritual books that money could not buy. I hope you may long live to fight the orthodox creeds; the world needs thinkers to get at the truth."

The Dispatch, of Erie, Pa., says: "Mr. Frank Ripley, the medium lecturer, spoke last night to a large audience in Grand Army Hall. He took for his subject, 'After Death, What?' The speaker told of the work the spirits would have to do across the rainbow bridge.' He told of their coming back to their loved ones left here and helping and comforting them. At the close of the lecture Mr. Ripley called his control and other spirits (he said) to him. Then he gave what are called 'tests.' As the control talked to him (as alleged) the medium would tell the story as it was told to him. These messages were to many in the audience, as the hidden ones pointed out. All who received messages were strangers to the medium. The messages were all recognized. Some of them were startling in their tragic denouement. Others of a humorous nature. There were many skeptics in the audience. But all were interested just the same."

C. C. Baker writes from Niagara Falls, N. Y.: "The Spiritual Truth Seekers of Niagara Falls have been highly entertained the past two Sunday evenings (May 4 and 11), at its hall in the Einstein's Block, by Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo. She delivered two very instructive and impressive addresses on the subject of Spiritualism. The writer heard many favorable comments made relative to these lectures. She also gave numerous communications from the spirit world. These messages were eagerly listened to by those present and the interest created by their recognition was intense. May 18, we have the great pleasure of hearing the noted, eloquent inspirational speaker, Mr. Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y. Our society here is only just organized. We have only held a few meetings; yet our membership is increasing fast and the prospects are bright before us for a large organization."

I. O. Brown writes from Northport, Wash.: "I resigned my office as secretary of Wheaton Spiritualist Society of Wheaton, Minn., about Jan. 1, and in March I started west to look for a new home. Here I am in this smelting town of about 2,000 people. About 600 of them work in the smelter. I expect to stay here. My wife, Mrs. M. S. Brown, who was president of the Wheaton Spiritual Society, will join me here in a couple of weeks. I find a few people who have studied occultism, and some that claim to be Spiritualists; but have not found one that takes any Spiritualist paper, which seems queer to me."

Elizabeth A. Craig writes from Texas: "Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley came into our state through its gateway, Fort Worth, and while there had large and enthusiastic audiences to greet her in their Temple. Her next stop was Waco, our home. My soul bounded with delight to see her, for I had heard her in Chicago, and knew her ability. Our friend, Mrs. G. C. McGregor, gave her the hospitality of her beautiful home. We enjoyed a rare treat in her lectures, and we are glad the State Association was so fortunate as to employ such a gifted woman. All her lectures were greatly enjoyed, the one on Sunday night particularly. Her tests were especially good, and proved correct beyond a doubt. We feel that our cause in the Lone Star State will be greatly helped by the ministration of the spirit world through Mrs. Cooley as their instrument."

W. E. T. writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "I have read the articles of Prof. Wm. Denton, given through the mediumship of Carlyle Petersilea, in your valuable paper, with much interest, and as they bear upon such important matters, especially the Catholic question, I write to ask if the letters published in the May 10 and 17 issues, with the matter that may relate to this important question which is to follow in your issue of the 24th, cannot be reproduced in pamphlet form for general distribution, at a small cost. It seems to me that now is the time for the people on earth to clasp hands with the angelic host, that have declared 'The word has gone forth,' which means that the angelic hosts are determined to abolish the nunneries of earth. This would afford us an opportunity to help undo this terrible evil that has been practiced so long upon earth, and to save the many that might yet be persuaded to give their lives in this unholy service. I take occasion to call your attention to a paragraph in one of our city papers, relating to a statement made by Pierre Bachere, the prisoner who was found semi-suffocated, but still alive in the dungeon of the city prison of St. Pierre. He says: 'I could not help feeling that there was a disaster near, and I screamed to the jailers to come and unlock my cell, but I could not make anyone hear. The little window in my cell looked out on the back of the convent where 200 girls and a large number of nuns always were, but there was a high wall between my cell and the convent. A pit had been dug on the inside of the wall in order that none of the girls should be able to climb up from the inside, and this acted as a sort of moat, in which the lava floated, and thus made a complete circle around the convent, rendering escape impossible, even if it had been possible to live in the rain of hot stones and ashes.' This is the paragraph I alluded to, and confirms the statements made under the dates before mentioned. It is high time that these conditions were made public, and that hundreds of thousands that are being misled are let free."

Mrs. Thomas Barker writes: "I cannot afford to miss one copy of your valuable paper. To me and my family it is food for the mind. I am only an infant in the cause it advocates. My eyes have only been open to the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism one year, but I grow stronger each week as I read The Progressive Thinker, the books by Moses Hull, Hudson Tuttle, and other great minds. I am convinced that Spiritualism is a truth that should not be quenched or hidden. I should like to hear it proclaimed from the house-tops."

L. W. Van Dyke writes from Denver, Col., in reference to the Brotherhood of Light Society: "This Society was organized not for profit nor charity, but to gather up orphan and castaway babes and train them up along spiritual lines and by the most advanced educational methods to be useful self-supporting men and women, and to do likewise for others. There are three degrees to the society; the first two are educational in nature where the members are taught spirit communion, and in regard to the life hereafter, and how to develop. The third degree requires a person to live in a communal home and devote his life to laboring for little children, and where all things are owned in common. Second and third degree members use no animal food of any kind, but live on fruits, nuts, vegetables and grains. The society has some children which have been thus trained for five years and they are strong and healthy and very spiritual. The work is maintained from the labor of the members and they live as a family. The basis of the work is largely laid down in Oahspe, but it is mainly directed by the angels who have it in charge. The members of the third degree are nearly all quite well developed in mediumship. The society owns a fine irrigated farm with a large modern house on it near Denver, where the present communal home is located. Outside lodges are located in Los Angeles, Denver, Chicago, Detroit and Cleveland, and another is being formed in Philadelphia. It is the purpose in the near future to locate a large tract of land in a section abounding in natural resources where a large colony will be located and all manner of industries established so as to make it self-supporting from the labor of the members and give the individual talents an opportunity for the fullest development. The society now has fourteen infants, and are arranging to take them by the hundred in a comparatively short time. It is interesting to see the little ones grow and develop. It is the desire to get them as quickly after birth as possible."

Next Sunday will be the last meeting of the Church of the Soul for Sunday services, until next September. Subject of the discourse will be, by request: "Reconcile Volcanic Eruptions, Earthquakes and Cataclysms with the Love of an Infinite God, and My Peace I Leave With You."

G. W. Kates writes: "We visited Peoria on the 16th, and held a meeting at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Brayshaw. We find this city to be in need of an earnest leader and offers good prospects for a local society of influence and support. The field is ripe for the harvest, but reapers are few. We had a good meeting and feel much impressed that Peoria should have the attention of our earnest workers. The State Association will get a strong showing here if proper attention is given and the friends here are encouraged."

Georgia Gladys Cooley writes: "One of the grandest features connected with the Spiritualistic work in Texas is the lyceum conducted by Brother John W. Ring and Miss Bertha J. Pfeifer at Galveston. Mr. Ring has an original method of his own; prepares a lesson sheet each week, and is preparing them for print. Every lyceum should consult with this earnest worker in regard to his method of impressing the young minds with the beautiful truths of our philosophy."

Mrs. Catherine McFarlin writes: "I am still holding meetings in the Independent Pulpit of Milwaukee, with good audiences and excellent results. I am engaged to serve at Waukesha camp, which will convene during August; also will speak at the Wonewoc camp, Wis., the second and third week of July. The rest of the camp season I am open to engagements, and will also respond to calls for mid-week meetings for public gatherings or parlor circles, or will answer calls for funerals. My phase of spiritual work is inspirational and trance speaking and clairvoyant readings. Anyone wishing my services please address me at 160 Juneau avenue, Milwaukee, Wis."

Mrs. M. A. Howe writes: "Billings, Mont., is in Southern Central Montana, at the junction of the C., B. and Q., and the N. P. R. R.; two through trains a day, each way from St. Paul to the Pacific coast; one through train a day each way between Chicago, St. Louis or Denver and the Northwest. Population about 4,000. We have a small society here of 20 members; meet Thursday and Sunday evenings, and would like to correspond with any medium or lecturer going through here. Must be able to furnish satisfactory reference and give the work under test conditions.

Henry H. Warner writes from Denver, Colo.: "The veteran worker, Mrs. Maude Lord-Drake, is lecturing here and giving tests to large audiences, and there is an awakening of interest in the cause of organization since her arrival. She is a fearless advocate of the N. S. A., and of the truths as she sees them of spirit return. Her lectures are eloquent and her messages are convincing. May she long be spared to do a good work among us. The writer is still here and liable to be for some time to come. Those wishing his services in Colorado can address him at 1330 Glenarm street, Denver, Colo. The Circle of Spiritual Light, at 1548 Glenarm street, under the pastorship of W. H. Hough, is doing a good work in the cause. The Spiritual Truth Society, W. E. Mansfield, pastor, continues its services at 1517 Lawrence street. The Denver Association has its meetings or conference for all at the same place on Sunday afternoon and there are some lively discussions here and a good deal of good is being done in these meetings. One of the workers here who ought to be employed constantly by some of our societies who are in need of a permanent pastor or even for a short time, is Mrs. S. A. Walters. Mrs. Walters is one of the ablest of the inspirational speakers in the ranks of Spiritualism to-day, and one who can stand before the most cultured and critical of audiences and do credit to the cause as a scientific and able exponent of the philosophy of Spiritualism and then follow her work with convincing proofs of the presence of our loved ones with us. Write to her and put her to work. It will pay you. Her address is 32 Gettysburg Building, Denver, Colo."

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley writes from Texas: "Since reaching the state of Texas I held two meetings at Fort Worth, in the Spiritual Temple presided over by Judge Wray, and was greeted by very interested audiences. The conditions were fine, due, in our estimation to the clean and home-like little place in which the meetings are held. Would that all societies had the same. The officers and members of the Fort Worth Association deserve great credit for their energetic work and zeal. From there we went to Hillsboro, holding two meetings where we found a small society of earnest workers, all appreciative of interest taken by the State Association in sending a missionary to them. Then on to Waco where there is no association, but under the management of Brother Jones and Sister Craig four very good meetings were held, sustained by the leading minds of the town. The next point reached was Galveston where we find the association flourishing, under the proficient leadership of Brother John W. Ring, who has been the pastor for the past five years. The growth of this society has been phenomenal, starting in a small hall with but few members, where now they possess their own large stone temple which is filled with earnest men and women each Sunday who listen with undivided attention to the spiritual and philosophical lectures given by the guides of Brother Ring. Perfect harmony prevails here, and one feels glad to be among the people of this association and note their interest in their pastor as well as his love for them. From here we go to Houston to minister to the society at that place for a week. The interest in Spiritualism is growing in spite of the cry to the contrary."

First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia.

Little did the handful of workers who gathered in Philadelphia fifty years ago to organize as a Spiritualist association, think that the celebration of fifty years of organized effort would crown the inception of the association they were forming with such a phenomenal success as has attended the Golden Jubilee of the oldest association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, which has the proud record of fifty years of work, nay more. Previous to the formation of this association, there was a Psychological Society in this city, and its members nearly all affiliated themselves with the new association. The records date back to 1841. The works of A. J. Davis attracted the attention of this society, afterwards the Rochester knockings. Circles were formed in Philadelphia, and in 1851, a circle was formed the medium of which was Mrs. Rebecca B. Thomas Allen. Mrs. Allen was the second medium developed in Philadelphia, and through her mediumship was given the instructions to organize the Harmonial Benevolent Society, which has been in existence without cessation, for fifty years as a Spiritualist Association, though it soon adopted the name of the First Association of Spiritualists. We record with pride that Mrs. Allen and her husband are still members of the Association, and have taken the greatest interest in the Jubilee, though Mrs. Allen was unable to be present on account of an injury recently sustained, though she sent a historical sketch which was read at the meetings.

It was an inspiring sight to see the veterans who rallied at this jubilee. No more impressive portion of the program, at any time, than was the salute heartily given to the veterans of the Association as they stood upon the platform on Sunday morning. Their silver locks told of their years, but their happy faces told of their joy. Sunday morning was devoted to the Veterans' reunion. Mr. John Langham, 92 years of age, Milton Allen, W. H. Jones, Capt. F. J. Keffer and others were honored as the pioneers of fifty years ago, while the arisen ones were not forgotten in the midst of the rejoicings. Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader paid loving tribute to those who had passed to the higher life. None were forgotten. The Lyceum and Band of Mercy, the Sunflower Club and the Woman's Progressive Union all joined in this happy occasion. Special sessions were held by each. Even the N. S. A. sent a special delegation and were enabled to participate. Sunday was the First Association Day; Monday, the Sunflower Club, an auxiliary; Tuesday, the Progressive Lyceum and Band of Mercy; Wednesday, the Woman's Progressive Union. The special features were numerous.

M. E. CADWALLADER.

Latest Report from N. S. A. Headquarters.

To the Editor:—The earnest and sincere thanks of the N. S. A. board are extended to you for all your kindly courtesies and helpfulness to this National Organization. We feel that the public is interested in our present work, and especially that of the Mediums' Home, as the first of May has expired, the limit set by the friends who had pledged fifteen hundred dollars between them for this worthy Home, if the Spiritualists at large would contribute a like amount.

Here are the facts and figures, concerning the repairing and opening of our Medium's Home: From the Spiritualists at large, from whom we hoped to raise fifteen hundred dollars ere this time, we have received up to this date, May 14, the sum of $411.41. We are to also receive about enough from our esteemed brother, Dr. G. B. Warne, of Chicago, as proceeds of the grand entertainment gotten up by the Illinois State Association, for benefit of our Mediums' Home, to make the full sum about five hundred dollars.

Those who have paid sums into this fund since our last report are the following: Mrs. M. E. Siple, $1; E. Linden, $1; Mrs. Laura Eager, $10; "A Friend," E. Saugus, $1; Mrs. S. A. Lovell, 50 cts.; First Spiritualist Society of Fairfield, Me., $5; Philadelphia Spiritualists Society, per T. M. Locke, $25; Nelson Adams, $2.50; Mary Mayers, $2; Mrs. Bird, $1; Mrs. A. Lumsden, $2; N. A. Phaler, $2; Mrs. W. C. Slocum and Mrs. A. Siple, $2.50; Mrs. S. Parrott, $1; Clement Rockhill, $1; "A Friend", $5; Helen Haddox, $25; Mr. C. L. Stevens, $50; Sarah Marlowe, $1; Geo. Driver, $1; Miss L. M. Delano, $5; F. Crompton, $5; Mrs. A. E. Barstow, $2.

Our sincere and heartfelt thanks are wafted to all these good friends and to every one who is in sympathy with this grand object. As the amount needed to make the house comfortable and ready to support inmates is not at hand a new plan is to be adopted. Before mentioning this, I wish to add that the two Columbian half dollars in hand from the contributor before mentioned, were sold at their face value, as we could get no premium on them, and this adds one dollar to the list.

The Board of the N. S. A., has recently sat in session, and the doings of the executive committee concerning the Mediums' Home were accepted and ratified. However, as it now appears that the old building would hardly when repaired, be the best kind of a home for our mediums, and that it will be better to rent that as a shop for a time, in order to keep its taxes, etc., paid, and to go on with our solicitations to the generous public for contributions towards building a new structure with the best of accommodations for the worthy mediums upon the ground that we own, and which is large enough to build a good brick structure, adjoining the Sanitarium. In the meantime, the N. S. A. will use what money it can afford in providing at the Sanitarium of Dr. Spinney, for such sick mediums as may need medical care, and other homeless mediums who need a pleasant home, also, in such cases, where the medium would grieve to leave friends for this more public home, to aid in paying the way of such medium in the home or place best adapted to his or her care. We cannot yet do these things on a large scale, but we can do something right along, and yet look to the Spiritualists at large to constantly, as their means admit, increase our relief and home funds for worn-out mediums. The two gentlemen will continue their offer of fifteen hundred dollars till we have enough to build, which will call for a generous sum, but every "widow's mite" will help along the work.

Only mdiums can be admitted to our charge. Veteran Spiritualists must look to other homes for their needs, as the needs of our worn-out mediums are pressing, and the N. S. A. can not as yet do more than aid these worthy workers in our cause. With good will to all,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
Secretary N. S. A.

PRIDE OF SOUL.

I dreamed that I had left the molded clay
Which men have known as me—my soul had passed
Out from its earthly tenement, which lay
Encoffined where the people came to cast
Their last looks down upon it and say
Their tender, whispered long good-byes.
I saw the folded hands, the fast shut eyes,
The brow from which the hair fell back, the face
Calm with a frankness that was new to me,
And I was glad to note the easy grace
Of all that I had left for men to see.
I watched the people come along the aisle
In grave-faced lines, some but to hurry by,
And some to stop and gaze a little while,
And now and then I heard an honest sigh.
And some of them that passed were richly clad,
And some of them were poor and bent, and there
Were honest friends I never knew I had,
And some, who had professed their friendship ere
That day, were seeking other friends somewhere.
While thus I gazed a fair-faced maiden stopped
And bent a little down and sobbed and when
She passed I saw where two pure tears had dropped!
And some one, halting, kindly then
Held up a little child that it might lay
A kiss upon the brow, and I was proud—
Not that I had beheld men come to pay
Respect to me—not that the busy crowd
Might e'en remember me a year or two—
But, looking on the form that lay serene
Where she had paused and where the child that knew
Nought of the sins that man may keep unseen,
I felt the thrill that those who triumph do—
That form was mine, and I had kept it clean.

ACTRESS MADE A STAR
—BY—
HYPNOTISM.

Under the Strange Spell She Carried the Audience by Storm—Famous in a Night.

Doctor John D. Quackenbos, professor in Columbia University, New York, astonished his associates of the Medico-Legal Society the other night by telling them how a young actress bounded into fame in a single night under the hypnotic spell. It is the case of a Trilby in real life; not the trick of a charlatan, but a sober, actual accomplishment of latter-day science. The new Trilby is a favorite with theater goers. Her first appearance on the stage was made at a New York theater, when, under the hypnotic spell, she carried the audience by storm; she was called before the curtain again and again—at a bound she was famous. The press of the city united in applauding her splendid work. This is only one of the many marvels of this wonderful power. The American College of Sciences of Philadelphia has recently issued a new book by twenty eminent hypnotic specialists, which is being distributed free throughout the country for the purpose of educating and protecting the public. It is one of the most weird and fascinating works ever written. It is richly illustrated with the finest engravings, and its vivid descriptions of the practical uses and possibilities of this marvelous mind-power fill one with awe and amazement. Among the many intensely interesting subjects treated are: How to hypnotize instantaneously; how to influence a person secretly without his knowledge; how to develop Personal Magnetism and use it in business, society, etc.; power of the human will; how to cure the most obstinate diseases and bad habits by magnetic forces without drugs or medicines; how to make people like you; how to win in business, in society, in love; any one can develop personal magnetism; rules which will absolutely develop this power within a short time; the transmission of thought; the development of soul power; how to make a business man listen to you when he would send any one else away; how to sell a man goods when he does not want to buy; a legitimate way to double your salary; how to keep people from influencing you; hundreds secretly influenced and controlled in body and mind without their knowledge; how to implant a suggestion or command in a subject's mind that he will carry out a week, month or a year hence, just as the hypnotist may wish; how to hypnotize by mail or by telephone; how to develop within yourself that inward power, that force of character, which instantly gives you a control over people without saying a word or making a single gesture. For the benefit of the public we wish to state that if you will write the American College of Sciences, Dept. PL 18, 420 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa., a copy of the above book will be sent to you by mail absolutely free of charge. The college guarantees this offer to be absolutely genuine, with no conditions attached. It is proposed to give away several thousands of copies of the book so that the public may have the wonderful secrets of this marvelous but much misunderstood science.

TWO IN ONE.

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the want of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

NEW EDITION
THE LYCEUM GUIDE
BY EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

Do you want to organize a society for the social, intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.
It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.
Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.
The price of THE LYCEUM GUIDE is 50 cents, postpaid, or by the dozen, 40 cents each, by express, charges paid by receiver. Address

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Miss N. H., Cedar Edge: Q. I feel that I am not fulfilling my mission and sought to be doing something more worthy. What is it?

A. Your feelings are in common with the greater portion, if not all mankind. None is content with his lot, unless too stolid to think. The spirit is always incited by the half-revealed prophecy that there is for it the possibility of better things, and more worthy achievements. What shall it do? Mourn and wait supinely for the coming of opportunities; feeling that the present is beneath attention? Oh, no. The only point of time that is ours is the present moment. What may come to-morrow we know not. To-day is ours, and whatever it contains. Our surroundings may be unpleasant, and discouraging, but what we shall be to-morrow in greatest measure depends on how we use the material of to-day. Our mission is always and forever, without reservation, without flinching, without attempt to evade, to do the work before us at the present moment. Not until that be well done, honestly done, need higher missions be anticipated. If the little things are left undone, or shifted how can the soul expect to conquer the greater?

The attention of a great manufacturer was called to a little boot-black, by the perfect polish he gave his boots, and the dexterity of his address. He called him to the office, where the boy brought the same thoroughness. It followed him until he became the superintendent of the vast business.

"Doing something more worthy!" Everything that is to be done is worthy. After Whittier had written some of his earlier poems, a company of literary men went out to his country home to see the young poet. They found him lustily cleaning a pig-pen! Probably he was abashed, yet in after life, he sang the songs of labor, which ennobled the most disagreeable task.

What is your mission? What of every one? To do to the best of your ability that which comes for you to-day, the best to-morrow. Wait not a moment for what you anticipate may be possible. If a hard row is before you, hoe it—so thoroughly no one will have to do your work over after you. You know not what awaits you at the end of the row, but be sure nothing does until you reach there.

The way to have a mission is to deserve it.

There is highest honor in any kind of labor well done. A task not well done is a disgrace. If our willing service goes not into our labor, it is humiliating bondage; if it does it is a pleasure. The woman who makes a perfect loaf of bread, has a mission as well as a Joan of Arc. To preside over all the details of a home, the apparently trifling things which may become of greatest consequence, may call for a mastery of soul eclipsing the achievements of that heroine.

Thomas Lees, Cleveland, Ohio: Q. Was the rapping at Hydesville simply the effort of the spirit of the murdered peddler to communicate, or was it a concentration of a great number of spirits to bring about a new era?

A. There had been several attempts, some of which were even more extraordinary than that at Rochester. Andrew Jackson Davis had prophesied the advent, and the spirit hosts were expectantly waiting the opportunity. The minds of men had become enlightened, and the medium would not be hung or burned for a witch.

When it was found that the three Fox children were remarkable instruments for the instruction of the new Spiritualism, the great organization which had planned and awaited the opportunity, at once made it a focus around which they gathered.

Vastly more significance had these rappings than the attempt of an earth-bound spirit to make his presence known. They were the first trial-messages over the cable which angel hands had laid across the gulf of Death. They marked the advent of a new era in spiritual understanding.

They heralded a great world-event, for which ages had silently labored. The sudden birth of the germ a thousand years gestating. Evolution has with resistless power forced humanity forward, but those who look deeply into this great problem observe that progress is not continuous, and while at times scarcely perceptible, at others it makes gigantic strides, as from valley to mountain height.

You have read of the wonderful calculating machine which went on through hundreds and thousands and millions, and those who watched it thought it would go on counting perfectly forever, —when as they looked, its wheels were seized by another law which the inventor had not provided for, and the next count was millions ahead. After this again the count began and went on accurately.

So in history we see that now and then plodding evolution is thwarted by its environment and again, without perceptible cause it takes a mighty leap forward. The Reformation is one example, the advent of Modern Spiritualism another. A new element has entered into the count, one manifested at the time of the Reformation, not as strongly. I refer to the interposition of the spirit world. This generation has felt and seen the influence of the spheres above us as no generation has before.

It is not possible even for Spiritualists to appreciate the tremendous power of this interposition or the magnitude of the changes it brings. It is beyond our comprehension. We see the mighty torrent rushing along, bearing on its eddying bosom the wreckage of old systems, the ruins of the fair shrines of our old faiths and the bloated carcasses of wrongs; and caught in its resistless tide, we are carried forward league on league before we reach again firm ground and are able to take our bearings. So changed! It does not seem that the same sky is over our heads, or the same ground beneath our feet. The dark clouds of superstition which rolled up against the sun, and the mists gathered thickly on the horizon, have been dispelled, and in our ears forever sounds the angel songs of joy and peace.

Lawrence Swanson. Q. (1) Many Catholics claim that the Fox sisters were converted to the Catholic belief. What are the facts?

(2) Where can I obtain a book with funeral service appropriate for Spiritualist funerals?

A. (1) One of the sisters in the closing years of her life, was persuaded by a Catholic priest to give exhibitions exposing the manifestations. She was in very destitute circumstances and the promise of reaping a harvest of wealth allured her. She gave one exhibition and one only, for the rappings came so plentifully and in such strange places that they could not be explained by trickery. The manager deserted her. Then she was taken under the care of some wealthy Spiritualists in New York until her death, and until her last moments, I have been told by those who attended her, the rappings came and communications were received.

Mrs. Leah Fox Underhill, the most intelligent of the sisters, never dropped a word unfavorable to Spiritualism, and only a short time before her death wrote and published a book containing her views and experiences.

Margaret, the wife of the famous Arctic explorer, Dr. Kane, never wavered in her belief, and was attended by the rappings through life.

(2) The Lyceum Guide has a funeral service, and also appropriate reading words and music.

Effie Crabtree: The manifestations you describe are referable to incipient clairvoyance, which you should cultivate by methods repeatedly described in this department. You cannot expect noteworthy results if you make no efforts to obtain them.

UNIVERSAL PEACE.

Peace Prophecy Partly Fulfilled

To the Editor:—In one of your issues last July or August (exact number uncertain) you published an article from me in reference to "The Universal Peace Propaganda," which I am trying to aid as much as possible by lectures, newspaper articles and leaflets. Since that time I have written many articles for leading secular papers all pertaining in some way to this movement. In a leaflet which I had printed last July entitled "A Spirit Message to the Powers, Political and Ecclesiastical," occurs the following passage, which in view of the fact that a great movement is now on foot in fourteen different countries during the present week to celebrate the Hague Peace Conference, was certainly prophetic, as I had no idea at the time that such a course was contemplated. The passage referred to contained these words: "You will see before long the grandest movement for emancipation of the ine s, and the disarmament of the military and naval powers, the world has ever seen."

The movement now in operation is described in enclosed clipping from Sioux City Journal, May 8, 1902. I hope all meetings of this character will receive the support of Spiritualists everywhere.

PEACE MEETING IS CALLED.

A big peace mass meeting will be held at the Court House, Friday evening, May 16, as a part of the great movement of the International Council of Women for the establishment of universal peace and arbitration. The plans for the meeting are not yet complete, but Mayor E. W. Caldwell will preside, and short speeches will be made by half a dozen or more prominent men of the city.

Similar meetings will be held next week throughout the United States, Canada, Western Europe, the British Isles, Australia and New Zealand in celebration of the third anniversary of the Universal Peace Conference at The Hague. May 15 is the general date for these meetings, but circumstances prevented that date being accepted in Sioux City.

"The International Council of Women hopes to set in motion through these meetings a great wave for universal peace," said Mrs. Melida Pappe, who is prominent in the arrangements for the Sioux City meeting. "It believes that by creating a popular sentiment throughout the civilized world for peace and arbitration these great ends may be hastened, and the speeches that will be made here and in thousands of other places will be made for this purpose. Next week an earnest plea for peace among all nations will go up from the cities and towns of fourteen different countries in every quarter of the world, and it is hoped that its influence will be powerful."

The local mass meeting will be under the auspices of the Council of Jewish Women, this organization being the only one in Sioux City that is affiliated with the International Council of Women.

As I am devoting a great deal of time to the writing of newspaper articles under the direction of my guides, the delivery of lectures whenever opportunity offers and doing a great deal of entirely gratuitous work in the direction of helping along the peace movement, I ask the assistance of Spiritualists everywhere in making arrangements for lectures, and I also ask them to aid in the distribution of my leaflets. Address at once 518 Sioux street, Sioux City, Iowa.

WILLIAM E. BONNEY.

P. S.—Spiritualists of Iowa can get easy terms for lectures, but must write at once.

FIELD NOTES.

The Missionary Work in Illinois.

We have been trying to get appointments for missionary meetings in the Prairie State, and have found it difficult to arouse sudden energy. All want more time to get ready, and some want us to stay several weeks or months and "work up an interest." We have letters saying their town is ripe for a worker who "will come and rent their own hall and pay all expenses" and take all risks.

Private readings are always plentiful, and seances for physical manifestations are sure to attract dollars; but lectures—well, "we are not yet ready for lectures." And public spirit descriptions are not interesting enough for all, as they are only satisfying to the one person obtaining them.

Are these hopeful signs for our cause? Reflect a little and determine if we find in this condition of relation to Spiritualism any hope for mental and spiritual progress. This only applies to a few—at least not to the majority; but we have phenomenalists who worship a sensuous manifestations and fossilize there. We may have some spiritual "cranks" who are fanatical seekers of spirituality and live in the ecstasies of soul exaltation; and one extreme is as bad as the other.

But what is a plain and practical little human fellow of the world to do to satisfy the extremists? Each looks for the missionary to be upon their plane.

Why can we not all let each think and do according to their highest and most sincere impulse?

We want to do that—but should not be expected to sacrifice our own individuality in order to harmonize. Personally, I cannot help but hope for a mental and spiritual Spiritualism that shall usher in associated bodies of people seeking a religious movement for the moral uplift of humanity.

Why not leave the seance-room occasionally and engage in a little of mental exercise, and even of devotional aspiration? Let us lecture a little—and let the spirit teach also!

A phenomenon is interesting, but the philosophy of it is helpful of its utilization.

Illinois is ripe for work and is asking that the State Association shall send out good speakers and mediums. Mrs. Kates and self could not get help and have groped blindly, trying to feel the public pulse.

We must urge aggressive missionary work by the State Association. The field in Illinois is good. Grand results can be obtained. It is a glorious State! Grand people exist within its borders, who are ready to respond liberally to sound business enterprise back of our organized effort.

No State offers better prospect for good results. A hundred towns will organize as auxiliaries if proper effort shall be made. A month of correspondence leads me to prophesy that an Illinois missionary can accomplish great results in a year of effort. Who will give an energetic trial?

Societies are looking to the State Association for a missionary, and the interests of the State will warrant the sending of such a person.

The N. S. A. looks for an aggressive movement to be made by each State Association; and the latter expects localities to move with vigor, and then individuals must enthuse a little. Let us have vigor all along the line, and every person feel that the whole cause depends upon their efforts. Do not wait for another, but act at once!

If you will do this, our missionary work will succeed in getting good results; but now your lethargy, friend, handicaps us.

Please remember that you should accept our services when we can reach your place. We cannot postpone our visit and go when you may prefer, on account of some petty interference. Our labors must be en route, and if not accepted then, we are not able to visit you at all.

We held a number of meetings in Springfield, Ill., with good results. Our friend, Mrs. H. L. Lichtig, has removed to Chicago, and will there publicly serve as a medium. Springfield will miss her and must find another leader. A good field is here for a local medium. At Watseka we had good meetings and will never cease to praise the hospitality of Dr. and Mrs. H. H. Alter. They are true and devoted Spiritualists, and gained our love by goodness and helpfulness. In Watseka Spiritualism has a firm footing.

Two nights at Le Roy showed us that this place will be a strong adjunct to our cause before long. Brother A. L. Coffey is devotion personified and will help even unto sacrifice. We were entertained at the elegant home of Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Crumbaugh. A town lot and $3,000 are already in sight for a local temple. A located speaker can do great work here.

Farmer City, near by, has a temple and conducts regular meetings.

We will also visit Quincy and Macomb, then go into Missouri and Kansas.

G. W. KATES.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

A Boston Medium's Instructive Experience.

To the Editor:—Since you have generously requested your readers to relate their experiences in their home circles, I thought that my case might perhaps be of interest to some people; so now I give some details. It was several years ago that I and some friends first tried our luck, so to speak, with private home circles, for the spirits to manifest to us, although in my mother's home, when I was a little girl, I can remember that we often had wonderful manifestations, both in the physical and mental phases, one of my brothers was a very fine medium at that time.

We knew, of course, when we were mere children, that spirits could often manifest in different ways, and in our childish way, we enjoyed what was then shown to us; but not then realizing their full value.

I do not know that I exhibited any symptoms of being a medium while in our childhood home circles, but doubtless the physical manifestations were aided by my presence, and none of us at that time understood much about the fine spiritual laws and conditions which should be complied with in every circle for the best results. As the long years passed, and I became a worker in the old Boston churches, it was apparent that one could not hear there anything new from the "Grand Spirit World," so we secretly began to sit in a small quiet circle for whatever the spirits could produce for us.

At first only three or four of us would meet in my parlor and sit around a small table, which soon tipped and answered questions as we lightly touched it with our hands; often the table would bow to each one at the opening and close of the seance. It would answer either spoken, written or mental questions; tipping once for "no," twice for "doubtful," and three times for "yes." Sometimes it would not answer at all. We soon learned that the spirits did not deem it wise or best to give an answer to some of our questions; also saw the desirability of reading the Spiritualist papers, books, etc.

All new beginners should read and study some of the books that can be bought from The Progressive Thinker, and learn the best way to hold "Circles;" and make the finest conditions that shall be helpful to both spirits and mortals then present.

At one seance the spirits caused the table to walk across the room on two of its legs, like a man, while two people lightly touched its top with their finger tips. Some spirits could tip the table very strongly, while others seemed to use very little strength. We found that the Indian spirits generally used the most strength, and that often they came to give us aid.

Later we heard the tiny spirit raps upon the table; these were never loud, however, but could be heard plainly by all present.

Then came the day when I was first entranced by a spirit who at once spoke through my organism. The invisible intelligence was "Flowerette," who claims to be a young lady of Spanish nobility, who some five hundred years ago as a child passed from mortal life.

After her came many other spirits that at different times controlled me to speak, play the piano, diagnose diseases, painters, and to psychometrize readings, tests, etc. Before I knew it all the higher mental phases of mediumship were developed. The spirits preferred this method for communication, to the more laborious and less perfect methods by table tippings, raps, etc.

We had used "Planchette," letter board, etc., getting some messages by their use. Controls always preferred to develop the sitters along other lines. Of course our home circle did vary in make-up through the years, but often we had good mediums with us who had their special phases of mediumship. One Harvard student was controlled to write automatically; was fully conscious then; also be entranced and give some marvelously accurate tests.

A phase of the circle which seemed to appeal more to the outsiders was the ability of my guides to describe the most obscure pain and diseases.

Some strangers were readily cured, and if I had been a priest in the Catholic Church, the incidents would have been widely published.

This is one detail of the work new beginners will be surprised at, that no matter how wonderful be cures or so-called miracles the spirit guides may perform, the Christian church will never recognize or give any credit to the spirits; instead they seem to want to crucify all the mediums, as they did the Jewish medium Jesus of Nazareth nearly nineteen hundred years ago.

Often when skeptics are invited to the "Home Circle," and their disease pains then instantly removed by spirit power, they would soon deny that they were cured, and in some cases even claimed all mediums are frauds, when through spirit mediumship their life had been saved. Our experience coincided with many others, in that we found people who seemed to have no realization of spirit forces, and they could neither appreciate the finest tests, cures, papers, books, or anything else on the subject.

In our various seances we have found that the best conditions of harmony, etc., are apt to be secured in a semi-dark room, one specially magnetized and devoted to the work. Good and proper music is a helpful factor, and some fresh water should be there. Sitters whose diet consists of cereals, vegetables, fruits and nuts, seem to furnish more fully elements the higher spirits need, for they can not obtain much that can be utilized from persons filled with meats, liquors, tobacco, etc.

Our experience has been that all people are endowed with psychic force, or mediumistic gifts, which need cultivation to fully develop the same.

Christians will find that if they want to co-operate with the spirit world, they must not disobey any law of nature or of spirit, and that if they wish home circles where they can have equally grand spirit miracles as were ever enjoyed by the early Apostles, Prophets, Saints, Saviors, etc., they must study up Spiritualism and comply with the divine laws of mediumship.

We know the churches do not recognize the work of these modern spirit forces, however highly endorsed, but still we say to all remember the spirit world is so anxious at this time to do just as good or better work than was done nineteen centuries ago.

Recently some very simple directions were given, but seeming to be so proper and reasonable I adopted them, and shall try to have such carried out, feeling it should be the endeavor of mortals to make as good conditions as may be for use of spirits who desire to give messages that shall interest. Directions were as follows:

Be in accustomed place at appointed time, to sit still, keep silent, placing both feet on the floor (no rubbers nor gloves on), place right hand on right leg just above knee, left hand on left leg, similar manner, palms of both to be down, when in seance-room. Keep the mind passive, in a receptive condition, not allow the thoughts of material or worldly subjects to then intrude.

Do not communicate by voice or in other ways with others, give close attention, to see and hear what the spirits then give; making no attempt to explain, or have any argument, as such tends to bring discord. Consider the seance to be a sacred service, which spirits and mortals join in; where all should meet with one accord. Spirit intelligences may be able to show, also say, that which will benefit and instruct mortals, also earth-bound spirits then present.

Yours for true Spiritualism,

ADELAIDE F. LITTLEFIELD.

SCHOLARLY CRITICISM.

The Forgery of Christian Literature.

A Christian historian is now upholding the authenticity of the writings of the Christian Fathers in the columns of an Infidel paper! He has just procured Prof. Edwin Johnson's "Rise of Christendom," and is proceeding to demolish it. He asserts, inferentially, that Prof. Johnson knew of Hardouin's theory before he began his work, and that he merely adopted, enlarged and sought to strengthen it. This assertion is made after quoting from Prof. Johnson's "Introduction" the following passage:

"I was led by these remarks (of Cardinal Newman) to consult the works of Father Hardouin. To my surprise I found that in his posthumous "Ad Censuram Veterum Scriptorum Prolegomena" (1766) he had anticipated the substance of what I have had to say in these pages concerning the Basilian and Benedictine literature by some two hundred years."

As the introduction to a book is always the last part written, and as in the above passage the writer speaks of what he has had to say in the following pages concerning the forgery of Christian literature, what are we to think of the logic that not only ascribes to Prof. Johnson a prior knowledge of Hardouin's works, but asserts that he merely adopted, enlarged and sought to strengthen the Jesuits' theory of wholesale forgery?

The only evidence adduced in support of this assertion is a reference, on page 401, to certain "other forgeries in the 'Historia Augusta' exposed by Father Hardouin in his examination of the coins of the period." Hardouin's book on coins was known to numismatists, and possibly, though not probably, to Prof. Johnson, before he completed his great work. On pages 390-393, a "note" by the author gives a synopsis of Hardouin's "Prolegomena." It is manifestly written and inserted after the completion of the book.

But to show that Prof. Johnson did complete it before he saw Hardouin's "Prolegomena," I now reproduce a note of my own written on page 17 of his "Introduction," several years ago, as follows:

"In December, 1882 and January 1883, the Truth Seeker printed translations of parts of Hardouin's 'Prolegomena,' made by me, the first ever published in English, I believe. Evidently Prof. Johnson did not see those articles before writing this book. I sent to the London Freethinker before 1886 my articles printed in the Truth Seeker, and I urged a complete translation of his book. But undoubtedly Prof. Johnson completed his 'Antiqua Mater' (1887) without seeing my translations."

So then the assertion that Prof. Johnson knew, adopted, enlarged, and sought to strengthen Hardouin's theory is not only unsupported but false. The critic resorts to the usual tactics of his class by besmirching and belittling the character of the persons whose works he assails. Every attempt at refutation so far is futile; nevertheless he sounds his own praises by saying:

"Possibly the reader may have begun by this time to suspect that the logic of Prof. Johnson was not much superior to that of Father Hardouin."

I have yet to discover a want of logic in Prof. Johnson's works, or even an important error. And as regards Hardouin, few have ever read his "Prolegomena," a translation of which was made by Prof. Johnson and now awaits publication.

At the outset the critic assails the theory of the wholesale forgery of the writings of so-called Fathers as scarcely worthy of serious consideration; he nevertheless discusses it at great length. He contends that there could be no monks without Christian traditions—as if monkery were a Christian institution only! He cites the fact that Hardouin in 1714 published a complete history of the Church Councils, and adds that when asked by a brother priest how he could write such a history when he had said there never had been a council before that of Trent, he replied: "That is something known only to God himself." Conceding the probability of such an answer, was it not a prudent one for a Jesuit to make, who several years before the publication of that book was reprimanded by his superiors and debarred from promotion in the the church? The Parlement de Paris suppressed one of his books in 1708, and he was compelled, like Galileo, to make a public retraction. He nevertheless reproduced his opinions in another book, completed before his death in 1729, which could not be published in Catholic France.

"More than a hundred years before this great forgery is supposed to have been committed," says the critic, "Peter the Hermit was carrying the cross through the forests of Germany." And he adds: "The Crusades alone are sufficient to overthrow the entire theory of Professor Johnson."

Peter the Hermit was a fighting monk, who necessarily could not have been a follower of the author of the Sermon on the Mount. The cross that he upheld was undoubtedly the Roman ensign of victory in the shape of an X with an upright P intersecting it. It has never yet been determined at what time the crucifix began to appear, but when the crucified one does appear he is arrayed in a tunic and a diadem, or he is in glory above the cross. The old Roman sign of victory was revived at the beginning of the Crusades. It expressed alike the sentiments of revenge and hope on the part of the men of the West in their struggle against the Oriental invader, and in time the sentiment became fused with the idea of the crucifixion.

DR. C. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Is Now Located at

No. 1087 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading symptom.

? ARE YOU SICK ?

—IF SO—

Does Your Doctor Understand Your Case?

Are You Getting Better?

If you are not getting better write today to Dr. C. E. WATKINS, Boston, Mass., and write him just your condition financially, and he will make his price for treatment within your reach. He is treating a great many cases free; others he charges a light fee.

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

Viewed by a Medium and Worker.

It has been with the greatest pleasure that I have noted the brave stand taken by some of our foremost workers in support of an institution for the training of public speakers, to present our philosophy to the public; and it has been with regret that I have perceived opposition lurking in our ranks, where it seems we should least expect it.

During my experience with Spiritualism and its workers I have had this subject forced upon my attention; and it has compelled me to notice the effects of education, as well as the lack of it among our workers; and I fail to note a single case where the medium is not used in the dead trance, where at least a moderate education is not needed, and the better the education the better the results. Many of our workers have the education necessary, while many good mediums place themselves and friends in a very embarrassing position by their illiterate use of language, even in delivering their test work, and many who would make good inspirational speakers if they could supply the language to clothe the thoughts received from the spirit world; but as it is, they cannot enter this much-needed field of work as teachers of our philosophy, with the success they could otherwise. And there are undoubtedly many of such earnest workers, who would hail with delight, the opening of an institute, where they could take a course of studies suited to their needs, even though they are matured men and women, and perchance well-developed mediums. To-day such can gain no such help, only through laborious (because oft misdirected) study alone, and few have the courage and patience to attempt self-education.

As I understand the intentions of its founders, I cannot see that they are attempting to found the school upon other than philosophical and scientific lines; their aim—as I perceive it—is to open a school free from sectarian bias, in which the environments are spiritual, in which the inner life will be allowed to unfold in harmony with the higher principles of love and freedom, and where any appearance of mediumistic powers among the students, will not meet with ridicule and contempt, as it would in the schools of to-day, but on the other hand, would be directed in the higher channels of mediumship, and where the students may learn to look up to the higher and better developed class of spirits for controls, and realize that it is worse than folly to give up their organism to the control of an excarnate spirit, whose education and development is not at least equal to their own.

It is true that every district has its schools; and the growing generation has good facilities for acquiring a liberal education; but in spite of this fact there will be many whose conditions are such that they will not be able to acquire an education sufficient for public speaking; and many of these children, as they enter man or womanhood, will come in touch with our work, many may find they possess powers of mediumship sufficient to warrant a public career; many may have the inherent ability and desire to teach our philosophy, still not be able to develop mediumship; but if they are bright, intelligent individuals, the chances are that they will refuse to become public workers, unless they can better prepare for it by proper training; and unless the spirits about them can force their mediumship upon them, they are lost to our cause, and where they are forced before the public, unless used in the dead trance, they fail to reach the more intelligent class, and no one, oftimes, realizes this more than they themselves, and it is for this class, I deem it, that the founders of this institute are working. I do not, neither do I believe its founders, condemn or wish to banish our sincere earnest workers from the field to-day, who are illiterate, but our wish is to prepare the oncoming teachers, so that our banner carriers may keep step with the progress of those about them.

The day has passed in which we can depend for recruits to our ranks, upon the presentation of phenomena alone; the fact of many of these phenomena has been accepted by all thinking classes, and now their question comes from all sides, from whence and how comes this power? And our assertion, or that of those beyond, that it comes from beyond the grave, is not sufficient for them, and they demand a thorough explanation of what we teach; and although we have many true and tried workers to-day, presenting our philosophy, the urgent cry is for more on every hand, and the successful operation of this institute will be a source which will supply this demand, in time, to a great degree at least; and so should find the moral support of every Spiritualist, even though they cannot all give to it financially. We must teach those within, as well as without our ranks, that we should not demand our loved ones beyond the veil to continue always to use the same illiterate or baby language that they may have used while with us; true they oft continue this use of their familiar talk; but it is to meet the demand of doubting mankind, for "tests" of their identity.

I have a little one beyond the veil, and two with me, and as the years roll by, I wish to note the growth and unfoldment of his powers, in spirit life, just as I do those with me; although I knew him only as a tiny bud—I, realizing progression to be the law of life, would be disappointed to have him return always as a tiny infant, just as much as I would be, to see those with me dwarfed in body or mind.

I think one of the saddest mistakes of many mediums, as well as their followers, is their demand oft unconsciously, that their controls always be the same; many fail to realize, it seems, that the controls are only human, and that what they may believe to be truth to-day, they may know to be error to-morrow, just as searchers for truth in earth life, and so would fain repudiate their former teaching to allow their advanced ideas to take their place, but they so oft are forced to teach the same ideas throughout the life work of their medium, or else break their connection with them; where, if all mediums would demand and accept progress upon the part of controls, they would reap the greatest benefit for mankind, while at the same time aiding the controls to progress, while as it is, they often prevent their progress.

I have been striving to prepare myself for work along these lines, for some time; my refusal to become the instrument for any and every spirit who could reach me, has caused a bitter struggle few can understand, and sometimes it seemed, I would be compelled to surrender, but by the help of spirit friends, true and tried, who ever encouraged me in my determination to have the best within my power, or none, I am freed from the conflict. Whether I shall succeed to develop my powers sufficient to enter the work as I desire, the future alone will prove; but I would prefer no mediumship developed, than one under undeveloped controls. Meanwhile I shall continue to endeavor to better prepare myself by study, which will benefit me, whether able to enter the work as I would like, or not; and I shall always add a word when possible for the higher education and training of our public workers.

Another thought brought out by this discussion is that of allowing children to be brought before the public; I admit that a child medium can oft convince the skeptic that it is spirit manifestations, where an older person would fail; but it seems the exception to the rule, for such children to grow into strong intellectual men and women; there are cases, where the controls are of the higher class, where they teach and properly develop the child, but there are many more that do not; some controls even declare that the less a medium knows the better; and so keep their medium from reading, or advancing in any way. Now we ask what will be the conditions of such mediums when they pass into spirit life? They knowing naught worth the knowing, and having no will or individuality of their own developed, can it be other than pitiable? I for one have demanded of those attempting to manifest through one of my children, that they use their influence and forces to strengthen his organism, and aid him in his studies, or else leave him alone, until he can realize and understand the forces about him, when they are more than welcome to guide him, if he, and they, so desire.

The only way possible in which an education can interfere with mediumship, is where it develops one into fixed lines of thought upon any theme; in which case it makes them positive to any influence that would guide in other channels, and this can be avoided by proper liberal training. The spirit world years ago were compelled to force mediumship upon the passive child; but to-day there is no occasion, in our opinion, to run the risk of sacrificing the proper development of our children, to convince a few skeptics that there is a life beyond. And the assertion that the spirit world selects ignorant mediums in preference to educated ones, we deem erroneous; such mediums are in the majority, perhaps, but they are used, in many cases, from necessity. In the past few well-educated persons could be influenced to lay aside business or social life sufficient to allow the negative, passive state necessary for development, consequently the spirits could not force their development only in rare cases; consequently the less educated more passive instruments were forced into use. Again the well-educated in the past were under the impression that to submit to development would rob them of their individuality, which they refused to surrender; while to-day we (or at least many) know that by a proper development of the spirit forces, the individuality is strengthened; this I know to be the case, from personal experience.

I have made this letter longer than anticipated already, but I will say a few words in regard to the cause here. The First Spiritualist Society of which I am a member, is still holding regular services every Sunday evening. The interest is all that could be desired, our hall being packed, and many unable, often, to find room to stand. Mrs. L. O. Larson, the medium who started the society, holds a mid-week service devoted to test work almost entirely, which has met with good success. I lecture for the society on Sunday evenings, she following with tests. We would like any good, reliable medium coming our way, to correspond with John Larson, secretary, No. 125 East Fifth street, Pueblo, Col., or the undersigned. A good organizer prefered, as our present leader wishes to take a trip during the summer or fall, which she has earned by her earnest work among us, having proved herself a first-class test medium, also speaker, and an earnest worker, and one who has done much for the cause here.

HEALTH RESTORED

The entire country is astonished at the wonderful cures perfected through the method originated by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Mich. This science is a subtle force in nature combined with magnetic medicines, and called by the eminent doctor,

Psychic Science

It has been termed the greatest pain reliever ever known. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system and restores health. It makes no difference how serious or hopeless the case may seem, there is positive hope in this grand science. It has restored the deaf, blind and lame, cured the paralytic, and those suffering from Bright's Disease, Consumption, Stomach Trouble, Catarrh, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Female Troubles, as well as men and women addicted to the liquor, morphine and other vile habits.

Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two month's treatment writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

written by Dr. J. M. Peebles, in a plain and concise manner, tells you exactly how and where you can gain perfect health; in fact, it gives you the key to the grandest knowledge known to man. Remember, this book costs you nothing, and it reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday realities of to-day.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and address and leading symptoms to Dr. J. M. Peebles and his associates and you will receive full diagnosis without any cost whatever, as well as this grand book, which is beautifully illustrated, rich in all its details, containing matter which will be a revelation to you. It is a token which any one may be proud of. Write to-day and receive "A Message of Hope" and diagnosis of your case absolutely free. Address

Father Tom and the Pope,
Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "potteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwonding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the spirits first," says his Riv'rence, "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every drop of water you put in after that, spoils the punch." "I pray be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knew what chrilur was afore," says he. "It tastes the Lachrymae Christi out ov the face," says he—"it's Nectar itself, it is; so it is!" says he, wiping his epistolical mouth with the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

Three Remarkable Books

"The Divine Pedigree of Man."
"The Law of Psychic Phenomena."
"A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life."

The Divine Pedigree of Man, or the Testimony of Evolution and Psychology to the Fatherhood of God. By Thompson Jay Hudson, LL. D. A most remarkable work, demonstrating the existence of the Soul and Future Life. It is scientific throughout. Price $1.50. Dr. Hudson's work on "The Law of Psychic Phenomena" is also valuable. Price, $1.50. His "Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life" should be read by all. Price $1.50.

The Romance of Jude A story of the Life and Times of "The Nazarine" and of his people. Given Through the mediumship of MRS. M. T. LONGLEY, to Ira C. Fuller, and by him dedicated to humanity. It is enough to know this work came through this excellent medium to recommend it. 174 pages of interesting reading. Price, cloth, 50 cents.

WISDOM OF THE AGES.

Revelations from Zertoulem, the Prophet of Tlaskanata.

A Mine of Valuable Reflections and Suggestions.

This work was automatically transcribed by George A. Fuller, M. D., a gentleman who stands high as a lecturer and medium. It is a mine of valuable reflections and suggestions. The paragraphs are short, suggestive and inspiring. Every one of them leads to something higher, grander, nobler. Price $1.00.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

HEALING, Causes and Effects, By W. F. Phelon, M. D. Deals with the finer mental and spiritual forces as applied to healing. Price, 50 cents.

The New and the Old,

Or the World's Progress in Thought. By Moses Hull. An excellent work by this veteran writer and thinker. Price, 10 cents.

The Religion of Science,

By Dr. Paul Carus. Ver thoughtful and interesting. Price, 25 cents.

Molecular Hypothesis of Nature;

The Relation of Its Principles to Continued Existence and to the Philosophy of Spiritualism. By Prof W. M. Lockwood. Paper, 24 cents.

BY M. M. MAGASARIAN.

This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book of reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND Other Offerings.
BY
EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

This volume contains a selection of the best poems of this gifted author and storiettes contributed by Clair Tuttle in her charming style. There are 285 pages, with six full-page illustrations, including photogravures of the author and Clair Tuttle. It is bound in blue with aluminum embossing. Many of the poems are especially adapted for recitations.

The Author needs no introduction to the spiritual public. Her songs are among the best in spiritual literature. Epes Sargent said of one of her poems that it was the equal of anything in the language, and that she was the poet of the New Dispensation.

The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."

That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."

Will Carlton: "I have read with great interest."

Sarah Thorpe Thomas, the Humanitarian says: "A most exquisite bouquet . . . . the thoughts echo and re-echo through the deepest recesses of my heart. I have some word of praise for every page."

The author says in the dedication: "To those whose thoughts and longings reach into the unseen Land of Souls, this handful of asphodels, mixed with common flowers, is offered, hoping to give rest and pleasure while waiting at the way stations on the journey thither."

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful num- Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

LIGHT OF EGYPT.

The Second Volume of a Most Valuable Work.

This is the author's posthumous work left in MS. to a few of his private pupils in occultism, and like Volume I. is (a valuable addition and) a library on occult subjects. Spiritual astrology is especially elaborated. Alchemy, Talismans, the Magic Wand, Symbolism, Correspondence, Penetralia, etc., are a few of the subjects treated of in a scholarly and masterly manner, showing the author to be familiar with his subjects. You cannot afford to be without it, as well as all his other books, viz.: The Light of Egypt, Vol. I., bound in cloth, $2; paper, $1. The Light of Egypt, Vol. II., bound in cloth only, $2. Celestial Dynamics, cloth, $1. The Language of the Stars, paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 31, 1902. NO. 653.

MAN'S AURAL SELF.

BY CHARLES DAWBARN, OF CALIFORNIA.

CHAPTER TWENTY.

Spirit Man.

The fact that manhood is but partially represented through the mortal form in earth life, as claimed by the writer in this series of articles, is becoming acknowledged by thinkers the world over. The effort herein has been to determine, as far as possible, the nature and relation existing between our outer and inner selfhood. That certain faculties belong entirely to the aural self is recognized at once by those who have proved the existence of clairvoyance and psychometric insight. It is in the exhibition of these faculties through mortal sense that we find the limitations and confusions that have been seized and used by materialists as weapons against the claimed facts of human immortality and spirit return.

That a connection between the outer and inner self of man actually exists is already acknowledged. One has been called objective, and the other subjective manhood. All can see if either exists after death it must be the Aural self, for mortal man has vanished. But both theology and Modern Spiritualism, endorsed by Theosophy, have been claiming and asserting that immortal man is just a replica of his earthhood. The Bible tells us of hands and feet, and golden hair, and even speaks of the appetite of those coming from the beyond as visitors to our little planet. This, of course, includes the possession of organs for digestion and assimilation adapted to the food and the form of such messengers.

The student of to-day has discovered that theology is founded on the inspired record of very ignorant men and women. It is now claimed by the writer that Modern Spiritualism has also been grossly misinterpreting the facts of its own seership. Under the all powerful law of "suggestion" the returning visitors have taught and talked just as conditions have compelled. Through "telepathy" they have commanded the experiences of earth life—both their own and that of the mortal investigator.

That an intelligence was present wielding powers beyond those developed by the mortal has been proved scientifically a thousand times. But this intelligence will, with solemn assurance, preach reincarnation on one continent and deny it on another. A renowned medium positively denies the immortality of animals. Another of equal fame asserts the contrary. On questions of fact, contradictions, confusions, mystery, have befogged every honest investigator who demands that belief shall be founded on reason. For such reasons the writer finds himself to-day receiving with suspicion every statement and claim made in the name of spirit return, unless resting upon a fact capable of proof by mortal man.

When we claim an "aural self" as a demonstrated fact we are not asserting that such a self has a monkey shaped form and organs such as are proudly claimed by man the mortal. Yet that is the belief of those whose claim for immortality rests upon spirit return. They have, some of them, begun to see the ridiculous nature of such a claim when applied to a personal spirit god. But they dare not yet conceive of a personal spirit man without the organs possessed in common with himself by every man monkey. So herein is a problem for such believers, if they dare stop for a moment and think a little about their own beliefs.

They dare not now deny the "aural self" as a part of manhood, with faculties and powers distinct from those of the mortal. But to such believers the spirit must stand as another monkeyfied man. He manifests intelligence, so they claim for him an improved monkey brain. He travels from place to place, so they endow him with legs or wings. He clasps hands with the unfrightened mortal who salutes him, and greets his widow or orphaned child at the seance with a full orbed caress. They have made up their minds that by a kind process of evolution he possesses and enjoys almost everything the mortal lacks in earth life. He comes back sometimes with an unlaundered toilet of glimmering white, apparently the ghost of a second-hand sheet; and occasionally exhibits a fashionable suit that suggests a trained tailor and a sewing machine "over there." So to the average believer the returning spirit and his surroundings are but a replica of mortal life, bedecked with immortality.

The careful student, with such facts before him, is compelled to acknowledge that he has no standard by which to measure aural man, either before or after separation from the mortal form. A mere fragmentary photograph, taken from any direction, tells the sensitive that there is an expression of manhood all around the form. But the same fact tells the thinker that aural manhood is without shape he can comprehend.

In earth life the intelligent Ego uses a form we call Homo, which has slowly arrived at its present shape by evolution and mundane compulsion. The changing form has left footprints all along its road which the scientific bloodhound scents, from amoeba to philosopher, as a continuous smell of the same odoriferous character. The enthusiast in spirit return believes the very same material scent, which a dog and a scientist realize, reaches from the grave into spirit life and continues there. And, unconscious of the absurdity, he endows his now invisible brother with form, smell, sight, tastes and mental attributes exactly as in earth life, save that they are supposed to have become spiritified.

We all know, thanks to our astronomers, that no form of manhood of which we can conceive could exist on the sun or any other of his planets. Earth Homo could not mate with his surroundings on such orbs. He would have to be heavier or lighter, taller or shorter than an earth man, and his organs would need special adaptation for his service. In other words, we have no reason to believe that the highest form of life on any planet or star would resemble our form of manhood in any respect, or possess organs like those of mortal man. Yet the spectroscope proves that the raw material of these myriad worlds, floating in space, is very much the same. We trace on planet earth a scale of form from microbe to man, evolved by the conditions of the little globe. As conditions throughout space never seem to be twice alike, neither our microbe nor our manly form would be found elsewhere. Something—in our judgment better or worse—would be evoluted as form by the existing intelligence, but it could not be man as we know him.

Applying such facts to our own life of to-day we recognize that conditions "over there" do not admit of a replica or exact copy of the form used by Homo in earth life. Everything around us here changes its form at certain "critical points." Steam, water, gas are the same raw material. Our atmosphere will become liquid or solid at critical points of the thermometer. In fact everything of which we can conceive changes its form according to vibration of its units. If our earth were larger or smaller every form upon it would have a different form, and the shape of every organ would be changed. Death is itself so great a change that all vibrations which the mortal can sense have become impossible, yet the student of the hereafter clings to his old conception of form as that of manhood in its new life. In fact Modern Spiritualism rests to-day upon that basis. Its materialization of form is supposed to be its crowning evidence that the manhood of spirit is cast in the same mold as the manhood of mortal. And this in the face of the fact that when conditions change form must change too.

Homo is gradually giving up his old conception of Deity as in the form of a man, with hands and feet, eyes, ears and a full beard. He now recognizes that all such organs are limitations to intelligence. So the great white throne has gone, and with it the God who sat upon it, and manufactured heaven and hell. But the poor heretic, still turned out of his church home for daring to think God out of his old form, has not yet realized that the same change will apply to manhood when it once becomes invisible. Yet the man who has commenced to think must sooner or later realize that a change in the belief of the special form of a spirit God surely involves a similar change in the conception of the form of spirit man.

In this series of articles we have not been specially investigating and analyzing man after death. Our direct object has been to chart the manhood of to-day in all of its wondrous fulness. But aural man is as much outside the possibilities and compulsions of earth form as an aural God would be. In other words, the part of a man we greet every day is known to us by his form and its movements. The other part of him which we call "Aural Man" is without any such limitations, and has no use, of which we can conceive, for legs and arms, any more than for an appendix or an improved monkey brain. These all belong to the compulsory limitations of his earth life. But as aural man is inside and beyond the change we call death, he typifies for us spirit manhood, save in his present compulsory limitations enforced by planetary conditions.

We have in these articles already given reasonable proof of the actual existence of aural manhood as an invisible part of the selfhood of Homo. That such aural portion of Homo's self is composed, that is to say, built up of units, is demonstrated by the fact that the sensitive mortal, whose every sense is merely vibratory receptiveness, senses its vibratory presence and influence, although he can neither see nor hear it in his normal earth life. Clairvoyance and psychometry are expressions of vibration as much as our school taught five senses. But there is no special vibration to tell you that an influence is coming to you from an invisible liver, or heart, or brain; or indeed to offer any proof that the invisible form of aural man resembles that of mortal Homo.

Our old belief that spirit man has a form that is almost an exact copy of the man on earth has been founded on so-called "revelation" from spirit life, sometimes in the name of God, and sometimes in the name of a returning spirit. We have therefore examined such revelations somewhat carefully in this series of articles, now coming to a close. We found that revelation, in every case and however pictured, can only be interpreted in terms of a man's own experience, and yet more, that at every point it is always subject to suggestion. There is positively no difference I can discern between the telepathy of mortal to mortal and the telepathy which flashes thought from spirit to mortal Homo. Our mediums see clairvoyantly and hear clairaudiently, the embodied thought form whether created by spirit or aural man. But at best they see and hear it imperfectly with all sorts of individual limitations. Thus it is rare for two different sensitives, at different times and places, to give an exactly similar or descriptive picture of either fact or form. The contradictions and absurdities which result are the perplexity of the honest investigator. A returning spirit will appear as in youth or old age, sickness or health, by his own creative will power. He will flash a thought of his old experience that is immediately interpreted into a test; yet through another sensitive he cannot repeat it. The mortal unconsciously supplies the missing links, and thus persuades himself not only that it is his old friend, but that he is practically unchanged. If the sensitive be gifted with a vivid imagination we have graphic pictures of spirit form, life and experience, told sometimes as tales, and sometimes as actual biography.

Let us remember that everything said through the abnormal mortal by the abnormal spirit concerning spirit life must be counted by the careful student as fiction, unless capable of verification. Its resemblance to mortal experience is an almost fatal blow to its truth, for, as we have seen, the conditions of that invisible life cannot possibly repeat those we have sensed here. This is the true reason why sweet tales of spirit life lose their charm for the investigator, although he may have satisfactorily proved immortality and spirit return. But such facts apply to our communication with our own aural self almost as much as to the spirit visitor. The student must take all the facts at his command if he would hope to succeed in his study of manhood. Anatomy, physiology and therapeutics deal with just a fragment of man, and even psychology wears them as shackles in its attempts to travel inward.

The experiments with Miss Beauchamp, the experiences of Mollie Fancher and many others, give us spectroscopic pictures of the hidden truth that only part of a man is expressing itself in earth life. The rest of him may be the best, or it may contain the worst of him. Most certainly one of the worst fragments of Miss Beauchamp, when it comes to the surface in earth life is particularly unlovable, almost hateful. Yet added to Miss B. the mortal, and the rest of her invisible selfhood, it may complete a rounded-out womanhood such as all admire. All that we can know, and love or hate in earth life is at best a fragment of a man, in the form of what we call Homo. The mistake comes in when we assume this mortal form to be a picture of the form worn by the whole man. Our conception of man's future form has been founded on (1) divine revelation; (2) clairvoyance; (3) mediumship. The first has lost its standing to the questioner of to-day, who counts it as at best both uncertain and undivine. The second, clairvoyance, is entirely a question of vibration. Just as one rate of movement would exhibit a man as green or red to the clairvoyant eye, so the form becomes twisted and contorted into pictures of gnomes, elves, fairies and monstrous giants, each of which is an actual reality in a certain rate of vibration. Hold up a blade of grass, charming the eye with its green restfulness. Just change the vibration of Homo's sense organ and that grass would appear to him as red or yellow. It is precisely the same with form. Form is a question of vibration as much as color. Change your perceptive vibration and the triangle may become round or square to you. So clairvoyance tells nothing of fact save the present effect of some object or thought upon your sense vibrations.

We now turn to (3) mediumship, which seems to most believers to settle the question of form and spirit surroundings, because spirits "say so." In fact the gravest charge yet brought against the present writer was by a renowned medium, who claimed that he was contradicting what had been taught by spirits for half a century through their mediums. So we will try to be very careful in analyzing the foundation of this fifty years old belief.

The Life and Death of Mrs. May Middaugh.

Another poor unfortunate has passed from this life with none to mourn her death, none to give her a Christian burial. It was not that she was a stranger in a strange land; it was not that she had no relatives within reach; but because her life for many years past has been a life of debauchery and shame, and she was a woman. A few years ago those who knew her tell us she was a beautiful, attractive girl, and no doubt beloved by father, mother, brothers and sisters. But she had fallen; the beautiful girl of a few years ago had gone down, until she was not only discarded in life, but, as well, discarded and dishonored after her death, and her earthly remains were laid to rest in Mother Earth, without the presence of an earthly friend or acquaintance to shed a tear or say a kind and loving word; not even a minister or other to offer a prayer in behalf of a weak departed soul. God grant that this may be an admonition that may reach deep into the minds and hearts of the young and old as well, to whom this knowledge may come, against indulgence in the use of intoxicating drinks and a licentious life.

With this woman this life had its beginning. It presented then to her none of the horrors of its ending, but gradually it entwined itself around her until it had her completely within its grasp, a withered, weak and helpless victim. We may never know the inborn weakness of her natur ; we may never know the temptation that lured her on the road to ruin, but we have faith to believe that on the other side of life, the father who has gone before and other good and true Christian spirits, inspired by the love and charity manifested by the great Master toward the woman of Samaria, will not leave her friendless or helpless, but will find in her some spark of the divine nature from which in time they may be able to help her to develop into a higher and better individuality.

"Roll on, roll on, ye mystic years, roll on
Unfold the secrets which are hidden yet
In the eternal laws of God's great plan,
Where Time his signs has set.

"Peal on, peal on, ye truths of Nature's might,
Send back your echoes to the squalid past,
And then look forward to the radiant light
Where all must stand at last."

MRS. CLARA WATSON---MOSES HULL MAKES REPLY

When Clara Watson made her first attack upon me, I thought her aberration only temporary; but, alas, it seems to have assumed a chronic form. Her theologico-phobia seems to have colored all her dreams; especially her waking dreams. A few doses of liver medicine would undoubtedly be of great benefit to her. If her disease troubled only herself it would not be so bad; but, it works itself off in a kind of cacoethes scribendi, and thus inflicts The Progressive Thinker and its readers. Her friends have advised her not to load the papers with her "tale of woe," but the peculiar form of her malady prevents her from accepting this advice of friends.

Her last paper abounds with phrases which need no reply; they only need to be quoted to show the form of her malady. Here are some of them:

"He has stated the wrong and the untruthful side." "It aroused his ire." "Brother Moses went down hard and he has had a gentle grudge against me ever since." "Mr. Hull's recent article ....contained the elements of falsity, misrepresentation and misstatement with a small grain of truth." "The stupidity of president Hull." "If Mr. Hull denies the truthfulness of the statements, he places the ban of falsifier on himself."

Whew! would not she, if she were not quite so badly afflicted, make a grand fourth-rate ward politician? I wonder if I—whose business it is to "state the untruthful side" of questions,—I who write "the elements of falsity"—I, "the stupid president,"—I, who am fastening upon myself "the ban of falsifier," would dare to reply to all these epithets. No; I think not; our good sister is quite welcome to a monopoly of all such expressions. I may have gone very low, but—well, I am not there. Such things contain their own antidote, and therefore need no words from me.

Our sister is still, as usual, after the "Revs.," and if I have stated a few dozen falsehoods, that, in her estimation, only proves me a "characteristic priest." At least, this is characteristic of the priesthood from time immemorial." Here, I will not enter into a personal controversy as to whether I am a falsifier or not; my life is before the world, but I must say that I have known even reverend gentlemen to tell the truth! I wonder what the clergy have done to her that she should be so rampant against them?

I say, clergymen, like others, may be and often are mistaken. Also there may be clergymen who are in the business for what they can get out of it; but I fully believe that the clergy will compare favorably, for honor and intelligence with the members of other learned professions. This ignorant ranting against the clergy, simply because they are clergymen, is entirely unworthy a self-respecting Spiritualist lecturer. In the name of a higher Spiritualism, let us rise above it. More especially when we accept the courtesies extended by railroads and by the state to the clergy should such things be placed beneath our feet. Sister Watson is a priest, and should handle the priesthood more intelligently, or resign her papers, which she boasts, "came through the U. S. Mail."

Our sister next speaks of the vote for that clergy woman not "duly, rightly taken." In answer I will say, everything was rightly done as far as possible. The call should have been issued by the president, but the president whose duty it was to issue that call in obedience to a demand of the members, refused to do his duty. They did the next best thing; that is, they got the secretary to issue the call. This, if it was an error, was done because those who wanted the meeting did not know the legal method of procedure. I must defend the honest society against the attacks of Mrs. W. and her good husband. I really doubt whether either Mrs. W. or the president would have found out that the meeting was illegal if I had not told them.

She now confesses that she wrote two letters to me against that ordination; yes, and she sent for me to come to her house, which I did. She also came to see me. I labored to convince her, that I could not ordain any one. I could do the bidding of the society which could ordain her if it wished to do so—that the society had a right to ordain, with or without a public service. All I could do was to go through a public service which would advertise to the world that the society had ordained that the person being ordained could represent it before the world.

I am a very careless man. I seldom lock my grip; I am honest and I go on the supposition that others would not meddle with my things more than I would with others. In this it seems that I was mistaken, for Mrs. W. found out just what my grip contained. She says:

"Mr. Hull said we had the legal right to ordain and came here with his grip full of prayers and huge parcels of blessings ready to sacrifice his manhood and ordain one whom he had said he did not consider worthy."

Here you have her statement; it will, of course, be a question of veracity between Mrs. Watson and myself. I deny in toto that there was anything in my grip such as she describes. I further deny that any honest person on earth beside Mrs. Hull and myself, had any right to know what was in my grip. I am sorry to say it, but Mrs. W. "talks through her hat" all the way through.

And so I have "sacrificed" my manhood. I have ordained, or rather I was willing to ordain one whom I did not consider was worthy. Supposing this was true; that is, that she was unworthy, that is no part of my business. If the society elected her, what I would do would be only to announce such a bargain between the lady and the society; there is no sacrifice of manhood in that more than in marrying a couple that I thought did not belong together. I deny ever saying I thought the woman unworthy. She is worthy to fill any place of honor anywhere. All I claimed was that she was educationally unfit for the place. She is an eminently worthy woman. A merchant, and respected by all. Beside that, she is trying to educate herself for the work to which she has been ordained, "by a bigger man." I hope she will succeed.

It appears from Mrs. W.'s paper that she, herself, received her ordination papers without a public service—that she did not even go away from home—that she sent for ordination papers, and had them sent to her under the secrecy of the United States mail. This would allow her all the benefits belonging to the clergy, while dodging the odium-anti-theologicum she seeks to heap upon other members of the profession. The other lady was at least honorable enough and bold enough to invite her friends to see the public ratification of her entrance into the ministry.

The readers of The Progressive Thinker are informed that I gave Mr. Watson a "thrust." I deny the charge; it was she who gave the "thrust." She acknowledged that he did wrong, and apologized for it by the statement that a stroke of misfortune, to which we are all liable, and which I will not mention, had affected him so that he was not himself.

All this, is nothing here nor there. The ordination question has nothing to do with the question of education. I simply deny saying about the lady who wished to be ordained, what I am accused of saying. What I did say, was that her provincialisms and mannerisms were, I feared, incurable; that with them she was not the one to appear on the Spiritualist platform as a teacher. I say the same about many who are already in the field. This is why I want a place to educate our workers. I will simply now say of the lady in question, she was in our school, in all, perhaps four weeks. She was studious and industrious, and made good progress.

Mrs. Watson says of this woman that she went to another state and was ordained by a "bigger man." Well, I had not heard of it; so I presume that the terrible calamities which were to follow her ordination failed to materialize. The shock to Spiritualism was not felt. I wish all of our speakers were as worthy as she. This lady had as good a right to go from home to be ordained as Mrs. Watson had to use the U. S. Mails for that purpose. On this question let this suffice.

The question opened was, shall we educate? Mrs. W. in her former article made a plea for "we who are ignorant," I showed that she had been converted since the ordination fiasco. That has caused her to undertake to justify herself, in the introduction of all this irrelevant matter in her nearly four-column article.

Next, Mrs. W. undertakes to prove herself a grammarian and a logician, things which I had not denied, by the fact that she had delivered several funeral discourses. I am glad she was able to afford consolation on the occasions to which she refers. I have no doubt that the discourses were fine, but I fail to see the connection between her premises and her conclusion. If it were stated syllogistically it would run about as follows:

Those who deliver funeral discourses are both logicians and grammarians;

Mrs. Watson has delivered funeral orations,

Therefore Mrs. Watson is both a logician and a grammarian.

Shades of Aristotle and Whately! bring on your funerals and we will all turn logicians and grammarians!

Next, she asserts that she was only "funnin'" in her last article. It was "written in irony." She should label her jokes.

Now she suggests that "President Hull be removed, and that E. W. Baldwin be his successor." In reply to all that, I will say that it will cost our good sister just five dollars—the same as we all paid, to become a member of the Morris Pratt Institute Association, and that the association holds its annual meeting at Whitewater, Wis., on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 24 and 25. She should at once become a member; attend the convention, and get her work in. That is better than to remain an outside grumbler. She has mentioned four good men who should supersede me—E. W. Baldwin, Prof. William Lockwood, J. Clegg Wright, and Hudson Tuttle. These gentlemen are all able men, and so far as I know, all my friends. Now if she can put either of them in to supersede me, nobody will rejoice over the matter more than I will. I did not seek the place; I did not want it. I will help elect either of these men, and will then help the elected men to do their duty in educating those who need it.

Come, sister, join us; bring in other members; people who can deliver funeral discourses can certainly solicit and obtain members in the Morris Pratt Institute Association. Try it; you will manifest more talent than you do in your efforts to develop your power as a grumbler.

Next the dear sister insinuates that I am not much of a preacher. In that she is right; I knew that much before I ever saw her, and have been reminded of it by my many poor discourses ever since. But she carries the matter farther and asserts that I have been in Buffalo four years and have preached to audiences of only seventeen persons—that two old Spiritualists had gone to Buffalo to the Pan-American and found audiences large in the evening when a test medium was there, but very small in the morning—that I have been absent much the past winter—that she was called to take my place—that she refused to re-kindle the waning interest—that "one was heard to say—but no," she will not tell—"but Pastor Hull will serve the society no longer."

What a string of charges; Hull should surely be electrocuted! Probably pen was never before used to put together such a string of misrepresentations. It reveals nothing else but the animus of the falsehood gatherer. Let me reply to them seriatim:

1. Audiences of seventeen persons.

Ans. I am not above speaking to very small audiences; but I never at any of our Sunday meetings spoke to an audience of less than from two to five times that number; nor at night to an audience of less than from five to ten times that number. I may have spoken to an audience of only seventeen persons at a week-day evening business meeting. How often does Mrs. W. speak to an audience of as many as seventeen in her own city?

2. Two old Spiritualists who went to the Pan-American found audiences small in the morning, but large at night, when a medium was present.

Ans. Perhaps. I was not there. I was away at camps. I do not remember of any medium being there at night, when I was there during the Pan-American. The church, when it employs mediums always employs them at night, because our night audiences are always larger than the day audiences.

3. I was absent much last winter.

Ans. I was absent during February and March only, which the church very much regretted, but they held good meetings with home talent most of the time.

4. She was called to take my place to re-kindle the waning interest.

Ans. Then, she was not called because of the absence of the pastor, but "to re-kindle the waning interest." I am glad, for I never heard of her kindling an interest anywhere. She ought to have gone. It would have been a lone feather in her cap. Possibly what she has said here is true. I never dictated nor advised the church on such matters except by request. I always thought the church knew what it wanted, and the one they wanted; and the speaker of their choice was my choice. I have a faint remembrance that individually I wrote to Mrs. Watson, inviting her to Buffalo, to "rekindle the waning interest." She had not the courtesy to answer the letter—the only one to whom I ever wrote on such business who would not answer. Well, we managed to get along without her. The interest waned, and waned until we turned over two hundred persons away for want of even standing-room in the temple. With her to have gotten in her "rekindling" work, I presume that all out-of-doors would have been too small to hold our audiences. Her statements simply show how things appear to jaundiced eyes. Of all the hundreds who have listened anyways regularly to me during the last four years, not one would confirm her statements.

5. I am to serve the society no longer.

Ans. That is true; it is about the only truth in this screed, and I am sorry. I now hold the church's letters asking me to state on what terms I can serve another year. I have the voice of probably three-fourths of the church that we want you the fifth year more than we did any of the previous years. Now, if our dear sister will join the Morris Pratt Institute Society and persuade one of her candidates to take my place, I will return to Buffalo, or to some of the numerous places where they want me to settle as permanent pastor, and start on another four years' campaign.

Now, Mrs. W. wants me to give up my religion and take "spiritual unfoldment. I take both, if you choose, but if "spiritual unfoldment" places me where I am fit for nothing but to grumble and kick at the workers, I want none of it. That can all be done as has been demonstrated with very little "unfoldment." If it led me to misrepresent, and hunt for flaws, I would take liver medicine and work such "unfoldment" off as soon as possible. I am thankful that religion, spiritual unfoldment and education all go together—that they can all be ripened on the same stem; and I pray and work for more of each for both Sister Watson and myself.

In answer to one more point, I will say, I fully believe in public schools. Our Training School and Institute are neither of them designed to take the place of public schools. We are teaching some things which cannot be obtained in the public schools. Public school teachers come to us to learn, and, are always loudest in praise of the Training School.

Our school is very small this year, but we have among our most interested students two public school teachers. One is with us for the third season. Such people appreciate our efforts. Our enemies are those who have never been to our school, have not even looked into it, or those who are without what we are teaching, and want all the world to be as ignorant as themselves.

Besides this, we have several students who never had an opportunity to obtain an education. Some of these are forty years old. We have had two students who are in their seventies. Sister Clara, would you deprive such of an education? Please do not do it? Sister, your pessimism will ruin you and some over whom you may have some influence. Let me beseech you to disconnect your conduit pipes with the filthy and stagnant pool of pessimism; connect with the pure, flowing fountain which flows from above, and you will see things as they are. Sister, I will help you.

One more point. Our sister found some nameless student, who learned that some of our teachers did not understand English Grammar. Perhaps; but my dear sister, we have had students who did not understand English Grammar; and the one who imparted to you the important information may possibly have been one of those. We have but two teachers who have undertaken to teach Grammar in our school, and I defy the world of grammarians to convict them of a lack of knowledge of English Grammar.

In conclusion, permit me to beg of Sister Watson to try to lay aside her bigotry and her prejudices, and to try to be reasonable. It would add to her comfort; I would save her from herself—from the results of her bitterness if I could. I cherish no ill feelings toward her or any one else. I shall be glad to meet, and, as far as consistent, to cooperate with her in every good work.

I have never yet read nor heard an argument against education—against our school but what was, in itself a strong proof of the necessity of our school—just such schools as the Morris Pratt Institute.

With malice toward none, and charity for all, I am for life in the cause of a higher education.

MOSES HULL.

FROM THE PACIFIC COAST.

A Letter from Dr. W. P. Phelon.

I wish I could take the office force of The Progressive Thinker, all of them, out for a little airing this morning, on this marvelous coast. I would gladly act as cicerone. I could tell all I know and a great many things I don't know, as all guides and guide-books do. But we would let our horses and carriage, coachman, et al, have their Sunday rest in the stable, and we would take that free-for-all, the electric car. No Italian sky was ever bluer or fairer than the one that encanopies us, as we mount the steps of one of the countless street cars that gridiron this city, and take one within two or three blocks of anywhere, provided, you are on the right car. A six-mile ride brings us to the Cliff House, resting on rocky crags like an eagle's nest, and overhanging the ever-restless surf of the Pacific Ocean. An immense system of baths, and an elegant residence with superb gardens are close by. These are part of Sutro's legacy to San Francisco and his family.

Sutro was the man who remembered that water always runs down hill when it has a chance. He dug a drainage tunnel at the lowest possible level, drained the great Comstock mine and other mines. His royalties were immense. But his plans for the benefiting and beautifying of San Francisco were on so royal a scale, that his affairs, on his passing, went into the hands of the lawyers, and it is only within the last week a settlement was reached.

After telling this, and looking over the remains, we would go down to the beach, and stretch ourselves on the warm, dry sand, and look over the unpacific, restless waters into the far West. The white sails of immense carriers are dots on the horizon. Streamers of smoke from some iron-clad battle-ship, outward bound, tell us of the Pandora's box of Philippines which passed from the hands of despotic Spain to the possession of free America. The box is wide open. Have we reached the bottom? It is not very creditable to us thus far. How will the account show on the world's books in the final balancing?

As we strain our eyes into the distance, we remember that water only intervenes to separate us and Hawaii, the half-way station of American soil, between the Golden Gate and Manila with its attachments. The surf dashes up on the beach, but the tide is going out. There is a fringe of people now all along the wet sands. They have come out of the noisome crowdiness of the city's restraint, seeking change of vibrations, and release from everyday care.

As we enjoy the sunshine and the freedom of position, our chat goes on about Kilauea, and the volcanic character of the Sandwich Islands. We wonder if we yet know the full extent of the awful disaster at the Island of Martinique, and whether we are sufficiently in the earthquake center to be affected. We speculate on the problem of the connection of all the burning mouths of volcanoes upon the earth, and if it is possible that they of the Western Islands will be likely to be quickened by the seismatic disturbances in the West Indies. Who knows and who will tell authoritatively?

We rest and talk. All the time we are taking great breaths of the blessed, life-giving salt air, and inhaling the brilliant sunshine through the surfaces of our bodies. By and by we attack the lunch baskets as per Hardee's tactics, and win a victory for our stomachs. No excursion on this coast is considered en regel without a lunch-basket attachment. We stroll up and down the beach, and then when we should come back, we would be ready for rest and sleep and to-morrow. Don't you people wish you were it.

The last week has among its events the celebration of "White Lotus Day," by the Theosophists, in memory of the passing of Madame Blavatsky.

The Society of Progressive Spiritualists, at whose head is Mrs. R. S. Lillie, meets regularly every Sunday, and is doing good work on all lines.

Dr. N. F. Ravlin is at Fruitvale, always ready for the work that comes his way. No word of mine is needed in encomium.

One of my individual, personal, pleasant surprises, last week, was a call from Will C. Hodge, whom I last met in Chicago. He has grown a trifle stout. He is the same earnest, warm-hearted, industrious, untiring worker as ever. He has no idle moments in this part of the globe. He speaks at "Loring Hall," in Oakland, to-night on, "How To Be Saved."

There is no question but the intense psychic force massed here has an irresistible charm for every one who believes in man, whether bodied or bodyless.

Never, so says the 'Forty-Niner, has there been so much building and remodeling of buildings in San Francisco as to-day. What it is in preparation for, nobody knows and nobody tells.

A TRUTH.

There comes a time to mortals
When the change called death is near,
And they soon will pass the portals
And meet their friends most dear.
Then the record will rise before them
Of the deeds in the body done,
And the Soul will not ignore them,
But will search them one by one.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

LETTER NUMBER FOURTEEN.

We had not long to wait. Soon the bell pealed forth its call and we hastened into the cathedral. The congregation soon assembled. All having crossed themselves with holy water, all having sunk on their knees with murmuring prayers, they were soon seated and silent, awaiting the words that Father Ambrose was expected to utter.

Many curious glances were turned on me however, and I knew that they were wondering who the stranger might be, and why he was there.

Ambrose arose and said: "My people, we have one here who would like to give a short address. I hope you will all listen to him patiently and respectfully. Whatever he may say to you, restrain yourselves and strive to hear without resentment, for I greatly fear we may not be altogether right in some respects."

Wonder and amazement were depicted on the upturned faces before me, and just in front of the altar sat the nuns, pale and affrighted, and with them Agatha, looking happy and content. I arose and confronted about five hundred souls, all of whom I hoped to lead into the light, all of whom I hoped to save from error and false teaching. I called secretly upon my invisible band of angels and they quickly responded, filling my soul with light and wisdom in order to overcome; so although I was the medium used, it really was a band of progressed spirits, or angels, that gave forth their combined wisdom through my lips; and this is precisely the way it is on earth. Spiritual beings seek out a good medium of communication and give of their combined knowledge to those in the flesh. This is just what I am doing now, giving through this instrument a detailed account of some of my work in the spirit spheres.

I now stood up before my audience. Should I ever be able to reach them with the light of truth and bring their souls up out of the bondage of darkness? Faint heart never accomplished much. I must be lion-hearted and courageous, and never doubt the powers that were with me. Thus I gained courage and looked at my audience without fear or trembling. I did not propose to lecture them, but to enlighten them. The influence of my band was now full upon me, for they knew by telepathy, or thought transference, that I was about to address these people. I shall now use the plural instead of the singular number, for it was really the band addressing them, their thoughts flowing through me as the channel. They did not commence by abusing the people; they did not tell them how dark and ignorant they were, how apathetic and lazy; what liars and frauds they were, how stingy and so forth; no; there was no tirade of abuse heaped upon them. The angels knew full well that such a course would not gain their hearts. They did not tell them that they ought to be punished for their short-comings. No—not even for the wickedness they had committed. The higher angels do not teach revenge, no matter what the sins may be or may have been, but the words uttered were the simple words of truth in modest garb, words that an innocent, simple child might have said. Now we will call it the voice of the spirits or angels. Said the voice:

"Dear People:—If there is one here among you who thinks he or she deserves eternal punishment, will that person rise up? We do not mean one who thinks that some other person deserves such a fate, but the one who thinks that he or she deserves it in person. Will that person arise, that we may make further inquiries?"

A pause—a long pause. No one arose. Here Ambrose broke forth in a stern, commanding voice: "Do you hear what this man asks of you? If you do, obey at once! You well know that you all deserve eternal punishment, and it is only by the grace of God that you are not in hell at this present moment."

We spread our hands out over the audience, and the voice said mildly: "Unless you think within your inmost soul or consciousness, that you really deserve eternal punishment, do not arise; but if you think that you really do deserve the eternal fires of hell—fires and tortures that never-never end—that go on forever and forever—then rise." Tears stood on the cheeks of many, but no one arose.

"Then," said the voice, "if you do not think, within your inmost consciousness that you deserve the everlasting fires of hell, then you do not deserve them; for the soul is true to itself as the needle to the pole. Thus, there is not a being in this assembly who will ever go to hell, not one who will ever be punished eternally. Are you not all glad that this is so?" A pleased murmur was the response.

"Now we shall ask another question. If there is a person in this audience who thinks some one else deserves eternal punishment, that some other person ought to go to hell, will that person arise?" A long and solemn silence, then about half the audience arose.

"Thank you. You can now be seated. Now as we take it, one half of those who are present think the other half ought to go to hell, there to be tortured, burn and fry eternally, in the fires of hell; but not one among you thinks he or she deserves it. This is not loving your neighbor as yourself. Now every man and woman present creates his or her own hell, but cannot, by any possible means, create one for his or her neighbor. Now one half of you are at the present time in a hell of your own creating, that very hell which you have created for your neighbor; your neighbor is not in it; but you are. Now, don't you want to get out? All who want to get out of the hell which they have created for their neighbors, hold up your hands." Many hands were raised.

"You want to know how to get out, don't you?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Simply this and nothing more: Love your neighbor as yourself, and think that he or she does not deserve hell more than you do. How many of you now, think that some other person ought to go to hell; for if you still think so, you have hate within your soul, and hate is hell. Now we want to get every person here out of hell, if possible. It is not a future hell to which you are going, or to which your neighbor is going, but the hell in which you are at this moment. Is there one here now who thinks his neighbor deserves hell? If so, rise up." No one arose, but many heads were bowed and there were furtive glances exchanged. At last an unhappy looking man arose.

"I believe," said he, "that every man, woman and child present deserves eternal hell fire. They all deserve to be tortured and punished forever and forever, and it is only, through the intercession of the Holy Mother of God and Christ our Savior, that any will be saved; and it is by our own petitions and prayers to the Holy Virgin and to her Son, which induces them to bend a listening ear and intercede in our behalf."

"But you do not think that you will go to hell, do you, or that you really deserve it? You simply think that all men and women deserve it?"

"Yes, all," he breathed emphatically, "every one!"

"Why do you think you ought to go to hell? What have you done to deserve it? Mind, we are not asking you about the rest of the human family, but about yourself? What have you done to deserve everlasting punishment—to burn forever and forever in eternal hell fire? What great and awful crimes have you committed?"

"In Adam's fall, we sinned all," he quoted.

"We did not ask you about the sins which Adam was guilty of, but what sins you were guilty of? Adam, no doubt, will take care of his own sins, but it is your sins that we wish to look out for."

"Well," he replied, hesitatingly, "I have been generally sinful, I guess. Don't know that I have committed any very great crimes, but just generally sinful."

"Have you been a bad husband and father?" we asked.

"Can't say that I have—believe I did the best I could considering all the trials I had. My old woman said she did not want any better husband nor me."

"Were you a bad father?"

"Don't know that I was, considering all things. My boys and girls loved their old dad pretty well."

"Then you don't think that your wife or any of your children think you are in hell, or that you deserved to go to such a place? Not one of them would desire you to be thus punished?"

"No, they certainly would not wish me to go there," he replied.

"Then you consider that your wife and children are better than God—more just and loving and perfect than God?"

"Sir," said he, "you blaspheme."

"How blaspheme? If your wife and children are more loving, merciful, just and kind, than God, are they not better?"

Ambrose winced perceptibly.

"But," added the voice, "we do not say that any of you are better than God, for God will not cast one of you into hell." A look of incredulity passed over the most of the faces of those present.

"Friends, a great mistake has been made. Men of earth are very apt to make mistakes, you know. Now they have made a great mistake about God, and their mistakes follow them into this life. Friends," and the voice became solemn and impressive; "you are all mistaken, every one of you." All eyes were now turned upon the priest.

"Holy father," said the man who had spoken, "Do you allow this heretic to stand there in your place to utter falsehoods and blasphemies against the most Holy of Holies? Say the word, most holy father, and we will down with the heretic at once."

"Friends, suppose we were to tell you that Father Ambrose, here, had made a mistake? He has made a mistake and we think he will tell you so himself." There was an expectant hush.

"Ambrose," continued the voice, "will you tell the people somewhat about your mistake?" Ambrose arose and looked at the people sorrowfully. The power of the angelic band was now turned fully upon him.

"My people," said he, "I am a guilty wretch, and not the holy man you have thought me to be. I have deceived—I have lied to you. I have not seen God, nor heaven, nor hell; neither the devil; and I have come to the conclusion that Denton is right when he says, these things do not exist except in the imagination. I have deceived you, my people. Will you—can you forgive me?"

He stretched forth his hands, and tears rolled down his cheeks. The assembly arose simultaneously to their feet. All hands were flung out toward the priest and tears were resting on many cheeks. It was enough. He felt that he was forgiven.

"Is there one among you," asked the voice, "who would cast this guilty man into hell? If there is, rise up and let us see who you may be." A dead silence, but not one arose.

"This man has deceived and defrauded you," continued the voice; "and yet there is not one among you who would willingly see him cast into hell; more than that, you willingly forgive him his deceit and fraud. Is the great and all-wise God, in whom you believe, more cruel and revengeful than his creatures? This man also says he has not seen the devil; neither have we, nor any other soul whom we have met. He tells you that he knows nothing of heaven, nor hell; neither do we as they are commonly represented; but you would all like to be happy, would you not? If there is one here who would not like to be happy, let that one arise." No one arose.

"Then we are to understand that every soul here would like to be happy? Are you not more happy for having forgiven Father Ambrose than you would have been had you desired to cast him into hell?" Bright smiles wreathed the countenances of all present.

"Yes, we see that you are. You all want to go to heaven, do you not; that is, you all want to be happy? As there is no heaven, nor hell, as commonly understood, suppose we all make a heaven right here and now? Would you not rather create your own heaven than that another should create it for you? There is great pleasure and happiness in creating. How grand and beautiful the thought that you can all create your own heaven."

All eyes looked eager and interested, even the man's who had denounced us as heretical and blasphemous.

"You have all thought that heaven meant a beautiful place, where you would be shut in with God, and spend an eternity in singing his praises; while the greater number of your brothers and sisters were burning in hell; but would you be happy, shut up in such a place throughout eternity, with nothing to do except to sing the praises of this monster of wickedness—this unforgiving, vindictive God—who had and was still, and would be forevermore, casting the most of the souls he had created into hell? Now there is no such God. That which is called God is everywhere at all times, is all things everywhere. Each person present is a part of the great universal whole—a part of God. If you are a part of God, you are at this present moment—and at all other times—in the presence and dwelling with God. You are in heaven and with God and did not know it. You are singing his praises and did not know it; but you would like to understand what we mean by singing his praises. Whenever you do a kind and noble deed, you have a sense of happiness—your soul sings for joy an anthem of praise to the God within, for the kind act that has been accomplished.

"Now, dear people, you have manifested a forgiving spirit, you have been kind, and a certain amount of happiness has been the result, and you are enjoying just that amount of heaven. Not one here thinks that he or she deserves to go to hell; it is some other man or woman who deserves to go there. Suppose, now, you forgive every other man or woman in existence, just as you have Father Ambrose, and think that no one deserves eternal hell-fire, and see if you do not feel happy in consequence? Try it, dear people; and see how much happier you will be than you are now. If there is one here now, after hearing our voice, who desires that some one else shall go to hell, let that one arise; but, search your souls well before doing so; think, it is torturing and burning an immortal soul throughout eternity."

A long pause; still, no one stood up.

"Is it possible that in so short a time you have forgiven all the world, and are not willing that any should go to hell? Dear people, you have taken a great, long stride toward heaven or happiness. Really, you are almost there. Is it possible that you have abolished hell and set its captives free? Why, you are doing just what William Denton has been trying to do all his life.

"You see the hell resided within each one who believed in it. As a man thinketh so is he, and if he thinks hell he is in it—is the master of it—and consequently a devil. Dear people, have you cast out the devil and hell, and are already entering in at the gates of heaven, where the God within you sits enthroned, for as one thinketh so is one? Now, my dear people; you are not obliged to travel away off somewhere to find heaven and God, you can make heaven right here in this very spot, and God sits enthroned within each one of you. You can turn all these buildings into mansions within the house of the spirit, or as it should be rendered, the house or abiding place of the spirit, otherwise the soul, or the father; for the soul germ is the first cause or the father.

"My people, we shall remain with you for a season, until your heaven is well under way; and Father Ambrose has become a messenger of love, peace and good-will to all; but, even after that, we shall visit you often, and as fast as we obtain wisdom, we shall come and impart it to you. Let us now join in an anthem of joyful praise, that we have slain the devil, put out the fires of hell, and are marching on straight toward heaven and God."

The great organ pealed, the people joined their voices and the place was filled with heavenly, or harmonic vibrations.

Dear friends of earth, thus I am engaged. It is the work I love best, the work I am best qualified to perform, and I hope and expect that I shall thus work until not a soul on earth or within the spirit spheres thinks or believes that there is a hell or a devil. Can I be engaged in a greater work than the abolishing of hell and liberating all the slaves to such a foolish and wicked idea?

Spiritualists may not need me, as a rule, but the Romish church needs me, and needs me badly. I work where I am most needed, and I will never cease in my efforts until there is not a nunnery in existence—until every priest shall have the right to marry.

SPIRIT WILLIAM DENTON.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE---QUOTATIONS FROM MRS. EDDY EXPLAINED

BY H. V. SWERINGEN, M. D., FT. WAYNE, IND.

Quotation 1—"Had wisdom characterized all the sayings of Jesus, he would not have prophesied his own death, and thereby hastened or caused it."

In other words, had Mrs. Eddy been born a few years B. C., or a few years A. D., Jesus Christ would have had the benefit of her great discovery, provided, of course, that she had made it at that time. Mrs. Eddy would have advised Jesus not to announce his approaching death by prophecy, parable, or otherwise.

Quotation 2—"Bathing and rubbing to alter the secretions or remove unhealthy exhalations from the cuticle, receive a useful rebuke from Christian healing."

Now this may seem somewhat strange to the reader who has been taught that "cleanliness is next to Godliness," but a little reflection will convince him that such instruction is wrong. That peculiar odor which is noticed in perspiration, and which is due to the elimination through the cuticle or skin of urates, uric acid, etc., as the debris or ashes of functional, life processes, and which is strong enough at times to "drive a dog out of a tan yard," is sweet incense to the nostrils of Christian Scientists, because of its metaphysical importance in their method of curing diseased conditions which only exist in "mortal mind."

Quotation 3—"Exercise cannot possibly enlarge muscles. Because the muscles of the blacksmith's arm are strongly developed, it does not follow that exercise did it, or that an arm less used must be less fragile. * * The trip hammer is not increased in size by exercise; why not, since muscles are as material as wood and iron."

To the ordinary reader this may appear a little illogical and need some elucidation. The point is, that if the trip hammer could be increased in size by exercise, the increase in size of the blacksmith's arm might be due to the same cause. Trainers of prize-fighters should take note of this argument, and govern themselves accordingly. It may be asked, why the exercise the "material wood" in the sapling receives from the wind and storm, is no factor in its ability to wax into the giant oak of the forest, but the above quotation from Mother Eddy is intended to settle all such questions.

Quotation 4—"This woman learned that food neither strengthens nor weakens the body, that mind alone does. * * The truth is, food does not affect the life of man. * * It would be foolish to venture beyond our present understanding—foolish to stop eating until we gain more goodness, and a clearer apprehension of the living God."

Now, this quotation ought to be sufficiently self-explanatory. Mrs. Eddy merely desires to assure her followers that they need not stop eating until they become more angelic and know more of God. This ought to be acceptable to all Christian Scientists as a safe proposition. Under its provision there will be no danger of starvation even if her dictum, that "food neither strengthens nor weakens the body" is endorsed.

Quotation 5—"The condition of the stomach, bowels, food and clothing, and so forth, is of no serious moment to your child. Your views regarding them will produce the only result they can have on the health of your child. The daily ablution of an infant is not more natural or necessary than to take a fresh fish out of water and cover it with dirt once a day, that it may thrive better in its natural element."

Mothers and nurses ought to be able to understand this quotation without any explanation. It simply means what it says. It certainly abridges to a marked degree the labor of the nursery, and renders unnecessary the use of soap and water therein. When the infant's breech-cloth becomes heavily laden, all that it will be necessary to do, will be to shake it thoroughly and reapply it. The other extremity of the child will be in need of no greater attention for the promotion of Christian Science health. Isn't it astonishing what a revolution Christian Science is working

Quotation 6.—"Leibnitz, Descartes, Fichte, Hegel, Spinoza, Bishop Berkeley, were once clothed with a 'brief authority;' but Berkeley ended his literary career with a treatise on the healing properties of tar-water, and Hegel was an inveterate snuff-taker. The circumlocution and cold categories of Kant never improved the conditions of mortals, morally, spiritually or physically. Such miscalled metaphysical systems are reeds shaken with the wind. Compared with the inspired wisdom and infinite meaning of the Word of Truth (Science and Health), they are as moonbeams to the sun, or as Stygian night to the kindling dawn."

Now, the foregoing quotation is particularly beautiful, and equally profound. The point desired to be made is that Mrs. Eddy has discovered something far better than "tar-water" for the ills of the human race. In other words, Christian Science just "knocks the tar" out of every other science extant. Medicine, theology, philosophy, physiology and every other "ology" are simply "not in it" with Christian Science. Compared with Mrs. Eddy's "inspired wisdom," as contained in her "Science and Health," all other so-called metaphysical systems "shine and stink, and stink and shine like a rotten mackerel by moonlight." There's nothing true but Eddyism.

Christian Science prayers, in order to cure the itch, must kill the little animals (acarus scabiei) or insects that cause it by getting on and under the skin and rapidly increasing. Now, logically, if Christian Science prayers can kill those little microscopical animals, they can also kill elephants. Is it not amazing, the power and potency of Christian Science? Is it possible that Mrs. Eddy can ever end her literary career Can her "authority" be "brief?"

Quotation 7—"You say a boil is painful; but that is impossible, for matter without mind is not painful. The boil simply manifests your belief in pain, through inflammation and swelling; and you call this a boil. Now administer mentally to your patient a high attenuation of truth on this subject, and it will soon cure the boil. The fact that pain cannot exist where there is no mortal mind to feel it, is a proof that this so-called mind makes its own pain; that is, its own belief in pain."

Now, anyone that has ever had a boil or a decayed tooth with an exposed nerve, or a cholera morbus, or a colic, will certainly agree with Mother Eddy that there is no pain connected with either one of those conditions. That "they all simply manifest our belief in their being painful," while in reality "pain is impossible, for matter without mind is not painful," even if connected with the great central organ by which mind is expressed. The inflammation, swelling, heat, throbbing, etc., of a boil are simply the manifestations of our belief in pain; our mere belief in this pain, we call a boil, etc. All we have to do is to administer mentally to our patients a high attenuation of truth—truth long or high drawn out I presume—and we cure our cases. I trust I have made this quotation understandable to the reader if it be not to myself. A first-class metaphysician is one who does not know what he is talking or writing about, and this accounts for my undertaking to elucidate and explain some of the written statements of that Queen of Metaphysicians, Mrs. Mary Glover Patterson Baker Eddy.

Quotation 8—"We weep because others weep, we yawn because they yawn, and we have small-pox because others have it; but mortal mind, not matter, contains and carries the infection."

This quotation contains the profoundest wisdom, as the reader will readily perceive. What could be more wonderful than the doctrine that the infection of weeping, yawning, and small-pox is all derived from the same source—the mortal mind? There is certainly nothing more amazing unless it be the assertion that the remedy of Christian Science directed to the "mortal mind" cures the small-pox. It would be interesting to know how it does it. I hope Mrs. Eddy herself will explain it, because I feel my inability to cope with its metaphysical importance.

Quotation 9—"I should blush to write of 'Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures' as I have, were it of human origin, and I, apart from God, its author. But as I was only a scribe echoing the harmonies of heaven in metaphysics, I cannot be super-modest in my estimate of the Christian Science textbook."

Now, the above statement of Mother Eddy is especially unique, metaphysical and timely. Had she neglected to make it, we never would have for an instant credited the authorship of her book to God Almighty. I was aware that the authorship lay between Mrs. Eddy, Dr. Quimby and Almighty God, but did not know until reading the above, that it had been positively and permanently placed. Mrs. Eddy's modesty in this matter bespeaks her merit. Had she not given due credit to the Divine Author of her book, she would have been guilty of echoing the discords instead of the "harmonies of heaven," for he who occupies the throne thereof has proclaimed himself a "Jealous God." Mrs. Eddy's confession that she was only God's scribe, secretary, typewriter or amanuensis, is evidence of no ordinary honesty.

Quotation 10—"Emerson's ethics are models of their kind; but even that good man and genial philosopher partially lost his mental faculties before his death, showing that he did not understand the science of Mind Healing as elaborated in my 'Science and Health,' nor did he pretend to do so."

The above plainly explains itself. You see, great as Emerson was as a philosopher, he did not understand Mrs. Eddy's science of mind even when before his death his mental faculties were in a condition best adapted for its full comprehension. As Mother Eddy says, Mr. Emerson never pretended to understand her science. Who, apart from Mrs. Eddy, does pretend to understand it? May it not be a question whether she understands it herself? Mr. Emerson certainly was not alone in his inability to comprehend Mrs. Eddy's "Science, Health and Key." Hence these explanatory comments "I am trying to make on Mrs. Eddy's Bible, etc.

Quotation 11—"In its literal expression, my system of Christian Metaphysics is hampered by material terms, which must be used to indicate thoughts that are to be understood metaphysically."

In other words, neither the English nor any other language is capable of furnishing words, terms or phrases sufficiently expressive of her grand metaphysical ideas, so that they be readily understood. It is extremely unfortunate that with the discovery of her science she did not also discover a phraseology in which to make it plainly understood by everybody.

Scientific discoveries as a rule are very simple and natural, and in their every-day application easily understood by the masses; but Mrs. Eddy's discovery is an exception to this rule, because it is so profoundly metaphysical, and Christianly scientific. Only God, its author, and Mrs. Eddy, his scribe, can be supposed to understand it perfectly. To the question: "Who, by searching, can find out God?" there can be but one answer, viz., Mrs. Eddy. It will be seen then how great are her difficulties in making even such men as Emerson comprehend her science.

Quotation 12—"I have always advised my pupils not to read works in advocacy of a materialistic treatment of disease, because they becloud the science of metaphysical healing."

The above is the least metaphysical of all the quotations thus far presented, and should be readily understood by the general reader as well if not better than by her pupils. The point she desires to make is that inasmuch as her science of metaphysical healing is as the noon-day sun, there are certain clouds of materialistic treatment of disease that are liable to obscure it. Such physical obscurations it is important her pupils should not investigate, but avoid. In other words, Christian Science is away beyond, and will not admit of investigation. The X-rays of no other science, ordinary or extraordinary, can penetrate into her metaphysical "Sanctum Sanctorum."

Quotation 13—"Portraying a personal deity is a misapprehension of the source and means of all good and blessedness."

"Prayer to a person affects the sick as a drug that has no efficacy of its own, but borrows its power from faith and belief in matter."

This means that, contrary to ordinary Christian teaching, God is not the source and means of all good and blessedness, and that a prayer to him in behalf of the sick has no more healing qualities than is contained in a drug the power of which is dependent upon the faith and belief of the patient in its efficacy. In other words, the drug may possess no virtues whatever, but the belief that it does, in the mind of the patient, renders it effectual. Well, it has long been an established truth among regular physicians, that confidence in the doctor and in his remedies, if of itself a potent remedy for good, whether or not that confidence is misplaced.

Quotation 14—"What I wrote had a strange coincidence or relationship with the light of revelation and solar light. I could not write those notes after sunset; all thoughts in the line of Scriptural interpretation would leave me until the rising of the sun; then the influx of divine interpretation would pour in upon my spiritual senses as gloriously as the sunlight on the material senses. It was not myself, but the divine power of Truth and Love, infinitely above me, which dictated Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures."

How beautiful! How grand! How thrillingly illuminated Mrs. Eddy must have been while writing her book! Solar light is at times dazzling, too bright and powerful for an ordinary mortal to bear with composure. But just think of solar light and the light of revelation together in one great beam permeating the inner chamers of Mrs. Eddy's immortal mind! What a powerful combination of light! The strongest flood of electric light is not to be compared with it. No one but Mrs. Eddy could have stood such an influx of light and divine interpretation. I have heard of people being unable to see after 4 p. m., but I never knew of any person whose mental vision went down with the sun. It is simply marvelous! Nothing but the divine power of Truth and Love could have produced such a phenomenon.

Quotation 15—"Until time matures, human growth and progeny will continue unprohibited in Christian Science, but we look to future generations for ability to comply with absolute science when marriage shall be found to be man's oneness with God, the unity of eternal love. * * To abolish marriage at this period and maintain morality and generation, would put ingenuity to ludicrous shifts; yet this is possible in science, although it is to-day problematic. The time cometh and now is for spiritual and eternal existence to be recognized and understood in science. All is mind. Human procreation, birth, life, and death, are subjective states of human erring mind. They are the phenomena of mortality, nothingness, and illustrate mortal mind and body as one and neither real nor eternal."

Now, what does the reader think of that? Is it not profound? Until time becomes of age or reaches maturity and is self-supporting, Christian Science will indulgently and considerately allow children to be born the same old way, and to grow in like manner as they have grown for the past millions of years. After time attains to his majority, has raised a beard and wears a tuxedo, then man will marry his Heavenly Father. But to abolish weddings at the present time, whether fashionable or less "swell," and maintain morality, and such a per cent of births as will comport with the command to "increase, multiply and replenish the earth," would, in Mother Eddy's opinion, most ludicrously tax the ingenuity even of Christian Science and its metaphysics.

If, however, the size of the distinctively American family of to-day (which consists as a rule, of the husband, wife and a pug dog), as compared with the American family of a few generations ago, is properly considered, "ingenuity" has already become equal to the occasion, and rendered "respectable" such "ludicrous shifts." The idea will hardly occur to the uninitiated that this condition of the Yankee or American family is one of the evidences of the truth and evolution of Christian Science.

Quotation 16—"It is a moral wrong to examine the body in order to ascertain if we are in health, and what are our life prospects. To do this is to take the government of man out of the hands of God."

This is to say that in case you have any physical disability or pain such as is caused by a gallstone, or a urinary calculus, or a pleurisy, or an oedema of the lungs, or a tapeworm, it is morally wrong to find out the cause and character of the pain or distress thus respectively produced; morally wrong to make a diagnosis. It cuts no possible figure anyhow, what the diagnosis may be, for the treatment of Christian Science is the same for all diseases and all cases. Its prayers will kill a rhinoceros as easily as they would kill and expel a tapeworm.

Life insurance companies will no doubt take note of this dictum and thus save thousands of dollars in examinations of applicants.

Quotation 17—"Christian missionaries do not preach the gospel properly in India where hundreds are dying annually of the bite of serpents."

Yes, a few years ago, three thousand persons died in India in one year from cobra and other snake bites, and among them was a Christian Scientist gentleman on the Malabar coast. His "Christian Science," for some reason or other, did not save him. It is probably because he did not employ a sufficiently high attenuation of Truth. It is unfortunate that he died by the method of treatment he sought to introduce among the natives, but when those Christian missionaries in India are displaced by an equal number of "Christian Science" missionaries who understand their science, we may expect better results.

Quotation 18.—"I demonstrated this as the leading factor in mind-science—that mind is all and matter is naught. * * * Matter seemeth to be, but is not. * * * What is termed matter is but a manifestation of mortal mind. * * * Christian Science eschews what is termed natural science."

This is plain enough to be understood without comment. You see, there is no such thing as matter. All is mind. What appears to be a brick wall when you lean against it, is but the manifestation of the mind of the bricklayer who made it. But the wall, after all, is not there. You only think so. You are deluded. This is the way Christian Science eschews natural science; chews it all up and spits it out with a countenance expressive of the utmost contempt and disgust.

Quotation 19.—"The five physical senses are avenues of mortal mind. What, then, is the material personality which we call I? It is the embodiment of sin, sickness, and death. Spirit is God, soul; and soul or spirit is not in man; else man would be identical with God. In reality, man has no other mind than God, it is only a delusion

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

HOW A THEOSOPHIST EXPLAINS HIS THEORY OF DEATH

F. A. BRUCE GIVES THE THEOSOPHIC VIEW OF GHOSTS, WHICH ARE NOT IN HARMONY WITH THE TEACHINGS OF SPIRITUALISM, BUT CURIOUS TO SAY THE LEAST.

Theosophy deals with strange subjects sometimes.

One of the fundamental propositions of the Theosophical Society is to "Study the unexplained laws of nature and the psychical powers latent in man." Therefore, the fellows of the society study "Ghosts." Not because they care to come in contact with them, but for the purpose of "laying" them when such contact is unavoidable.

Did you ever stop to think how much can be learned about a subject by making a special study of it? All our great scientists, our learned ones of every department in nature-study, give opinions based upon their investigations and the recorded observations of others. The Theosophist does the same.

Perhaps you do not "believe in ghosts?" I do.

Do you know that ghosts are a necessity in the work of nature? Were there no ghosts nature would fail. Ghosts come under the head of the "unexplained laws of nature." The Theosophist studies ghosts the same as a physician studies disease. He calls a ghost a "bhuta," or an elementary. Every animal has a bhuta, there are dog-bhutas as well as human. That is why the ghosts of dogs have been seen.

What is this bhuta? What is its composition? Read on if you are interested and receive a new gloss to your coat of wisdom.

Do you know what the word "desire" means? Of course you do! It is the principle which holds things together; the passions, emotions and appetites belonging to the animal body and brain. In its higher aspects desire is good, its lower aspects are bad or inconsequent. Desire is the creative principle in nature; it is the energy applied to matter which produces forms. You are in feature exactly what you make yourself, the expression of your individual desires. Your "ghost" has much to do with your personality. Think this out, it will be as "plain as day" if you do, or "as clear as mud" if you do not.

Desire, in its lower phase, is the principle which assembles and holds together your bhuta. It is "energy" applied to matter, but the matter composing your bhuta is more plastic than the matter which is evident, ordinarily, to your five senses. You, however, have other senses; that is why you can see ghosts, if you want to.

This desire, if strong per se, produces a strong expression. It builds up an etheric body which permeates your physical body and holds it together. It is, in fact, the mold or so-called "astral" body upon which your physical body is builded. It is the "animal soul." At death it should disintegrate as quickly as the physical body, but it does not always do so. It then becomes the "spook," a kama-rupa or desire-form. If you die full of the thoughts of this world, of strong desires to hold on to your money, your friends or social position, your bhuta will be attracted to the scene of your earthly operations and will sometimes cause a disturbance.

"How," do you ask? Let me unfold to you the mystery of death. Let me explain to you that "death" is not what it seems to be.

While you are passing through this great change certain states of consciousness are reached, certain planes of matter crossed and certain lessons learned. As you grow tired of the effort to resist death a feeling that you are dependent upon someone else seizes you. You will perhaps see a shadowy form standing or floating near and you will believe it to be an angel. It will not be an angel, however, merely your [illegible]-ego, your other-self. You [illegible] aware of this presence because you are beginning to separate, to "fall apart." A gradual sense of separateness from your surroundings falls upon you, consciousness flickers and flares like a tiny flame in a draught of air. A solemn hush, a momentary suspension of all the faculties of sense and thought—then, like a rushing torrent, pours the life forces over every nerve and fibre of the body. Sometimes this last protest of the life principle against dissolution produces a spasmodic contraction of the muscles, frightful to behold; sometimes merely a slight tremor and a placid smile. Then comes flowing through the brain-mind the panorama of the acts of the past life. Down to their most minute details the memories of thought and action are awakened. The dying one rapidly traveling over the past as one turns backward the pages of a picture-book; he sees himself the bed-ridden man, the hearty, proud father surrounded by his children; again his marriage day, his young bride on his arm; then again a child with his mother's "sleepy-song" lulling him to forgetfulness. These, with all intermediate incidents, are vividly portrayed. This marks the passing of the mind principle, it is gathering up its store of memories.

Then comes that solemn moment when the soul, the true self, slowly disengages itself from the tenement of clay. Death has come, but it is not yet finished. It takes some time for man to be born into the world, it takes some time for him to die out of it.

Let us now take up what is left by the soul's departure and examine it. We all know that the physical body is reabsorbed by nature; that it decays and enters into other compositions, but—there is something else left, something that is not ordinarily taken into consideration. It is the bhuta, or "ghost."

In cases of accidental death, when the self with its strong desires is torn violently from the body, it has a wide and wonderful experience in the desire-world. Theosophists call this world "kama-loka," i. e., place of desires. Some Christians recognize this place as "purgatory." Kama-loka, or purgatory, is right in this world; we feel it, if we do not often see it. It is the plane of ghosts. To this realm come the victims of murder and accident, the suicide and the legally executed. Some Christians pray "From sudden death deliver us," without understanding the reason for such prayer.

The soul which is so enmeshed in matter that it can get no further than kama-loka is indeed in need of our prayers and friendly offices, but these must be rightly applied.

Theosophy teaches us that in this case it is best for it to go to sleep and let nature slowly disentangle it. This is best, for death is a "sleeping" process and awakening arrests it. Any loud prayers or lamentations, incantations or doleful music at interments should be avoided if we wish our departed ones to be happy. To get them out of this nightmare state we must assume the same mental position toward them as the mother who seeks to comfort her fretful child and bring slumber to its aid.

The best way to get out of purgatory" is to go to sleep and trust Divine wisdom. You will be an unhappy ghost if you don't.

With aged people and children death is an easy process, the first having outlived the desire to live, the others not having developed it to a great extent. But with a young, vigorous person, who is filled with plans for the future based upon the experiences of the past, the matter of dying is sometimes complicated. He or she generally has strong desires, a well-defined animal soul, and, as desire is the energy which is applied to all things, this energy does not dissipate quickly, but gathers about it the dregs of the etheric personality and continues to exist as a separate entity. This becomes the bhuta.

Of course this ghost is merely an aggregate of energy and etheric matter. It is senseless, having no mind, and is automatic in its action. That is, it repeats actions wherein it as a part of that complex creature, man, participated and can evolve nothing new. If it was the principle of a miser, it hovers near his hoard; if of a lover, it is ever near his mistress; if a murderer, it haunts the scene of the tragedy. It can be seen. It is often seen.

Trooping around us, invisible to ordinary eyes, are myriads of these senseless bhutas responding to our passions, our loves, fears, hates, and thus receiving from us the impulse to re-enact the dramas, the tragedies and even the charities which are a part of their memories. These bhutas are the "spirits" which are called up in the seance rooms and which produce the little bits of true manifestation found there. Ghosts are not very dangerous in themselves, but are decidedly dangerous on account of the company they keep. "How so?" Let us see!

Swarming in the lower strata of the etheric atmosphere of our globe are a class of "lives" which are ever seeking to enter the bodies of men. These are the disease-bringers, the "destroyers," the "larvae" produced by the brutality of man. These "larvae" are the grave-worms of the etheric graveyard where the bhutas slowly decay. They are generated from the etheric bodies as grave-worms are generated from bodies of clay. They infest the bhutas which are in process of disintegration on the etheric (astral) plane and use them as the means to reach physical man. Attend the seance. Call up your departed friend. It comes, a half-rotted, larvae-covered thing. It responds to your impulses automatically, because old memories are aroused and repeated. It drifts near you. A small pimple on your cheek filled with prurient matter attracts the larvae. It fastens upon you. Henceforth you are shadowed by this loathsome thing and you wonder why you feel sick.

"A rag, and a bone, and a hank of hair" represents a soulless condition. It is "bhuta," soulless.

The dead can do us no harm if we refuse to open graves. If we do not care to witness the ravages made by worms in the physical bodies of our dear friends, why should we desire to come in contact with the revolting spectacle of the etheric graveyard? Why be ghouls? Think this over.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

MASONIC RESOLUTIONS.

Another solemn alarm has been made at the door of our lodge, and the messenger was the bright angel of death. Another true and faithful brother has been summoned from the activity of life to the eternal silence of the grave. One who has done his duty in the pilgrimage of life as God has given him to see that duty; one who has been known and honored by his fellow-citizens and who has never disappointed the hopes and expectations of his friends; one who has long been a faithful craftsman and honored and esteemed by the great institution of Freemasonry; has been called from the labor of life to the endless refreshment of Heaven. It is fitting, that assembled in the character of Masons, to offer our last sad tribute to the memory of our deceased brother, we before his open grave and in presence of * * * Almighty God, adopt appropriate resolutions commemorative of this solemn occasion. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That Brother William S. Wood has fought the good fight of human life, he has finished his earthly course, he has kept the faith. Ever trusty and reliable as a friend, honest and public-spirited as a citizen, steadfast and loyal as a Mason, he has completed the journey of his earthly probation. He was strong in his attachments, firm in his convictions, sincere in his purpose and tender in his emotions. His numerous kindnesses, his many benefactions will never be forgotten. He has quietly and without ostentation made a record worthy of emulation. He has earned a crown of glory. It will be worthily worn.

Resolved, That we tender to the brother and sister and to the relatives of our deceased brother our profound sympathy in this hour of their deep affliction. In our human weakness we can offer but little consolation in their great bereavement. But we commend them to that great and good Being, who alone can sustain and comfort them in their sorrow and bind up their bleeding hearts.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

that he seems to have another mind."

I will endeavor to make this plainer to the reader. You see, the five physical senses, with equiponderating concatenation, excomfloppergates upon the heterogeneous animosity of non-existent mortal mind, and seriously animadverts upon the reverberating momentum of enthusiastic material personality, in such a manner as to occasion an irrepressible conflict between mortal and immortal mind.

Quotation 20—"To quench the glowing flames of falsehood, once in about seven years, I have to repeat this—that I use no drugs whatever, not even coffee, tea or red pepper; though every day, and especially at dinner, I indulge in homeopathic doses of common salt."

Now, you see, the body, according to modern physiology and pathology, changes entirely once in seven years, and it therefore becomes necessary for Mrs. Eddy to reassert with the same regularity, that she makes no use of coffee, tea or red pepper, notwithstanding the non-existence of those articles, because "matter is naught." It is a little strange that Mother Eddy will indulge in common salt even in homeopathic doses, because in Jahr's Manual of Homeopathic Medicine, of the edition of 1838, four and a half pages are devoted to the effects of common salt. Its mental effects are described as follows: "Melancholic sadness, with searching for many unpleasant things, much weeping, and increased by consolation—sorrowfulness about futurity—anxiousness also during a thunderstorm, chiefly at night—indolence, aversion to talk, joyfulness, and disinclination to labor—hasty impatience and irritability—easily frightened—hate of former offenders—fretfulness and disposition to angry violence—inclination to laugh—alternation of fretfulness and hilarity—great weakness of memory and forgetfulness—thoughtlessness and mental dissipation—misusing words in speaking and writing—inability to reflect and fatigue from mental exertion—awkwardness." These are the effects which homeopathy attribute to common salt, which, if correct, will account for some of the idiosyncrasies, eccentricities, delusions, illusions and peculiarities of Mrs. Eddy. I would advise her not to eat any more salt even in homeopathic doses. Perhaps, if she would stop eating salt, she would attain a mental condition in which she would be better able to explain satisfactorily, the occult, metaphysical intricacies of Christian Science.

Quotation 21.—"Erring mortal views named mind produce all the organic and animal action of the mortal body * * * It is not enough to say that matter is the substratum of evil, and that its highest attenuation is mortal mind; for there is strictly speaking no mortal mind. Mind is immortal. * * Death is the consequent of an antecedent false assumption of the realness of something material and mortal."

This means that, for instance, one's erroneous views on politics keep his liver in action; one's erroneous views on religion keep his bowels moving; one's erroneous views on love keep his heart going, etc. Matter, when long drawn out or "highly attenuated" becomes that which strictly speaking, is not, viz., mortal mind. Death is the result of the non-existence of the material and mortal. But the reader will clearly understand this without further exemplification.

Quotation 22.—"What appears to the senses as death is but a mortal illusion, instead of being matter in the death-process. Men say the body is dead; but this death was the departure of mortal illusion, not of matter."

This may seem a little obscure to the uninitiated reader, but it will become perfectly plain to him the minute he understands it. That minute may be some distance ahead in the future, but when it comes it will be here. If he can simply get fixed in his mind the dictum that there is no such thing as matter, the above quotation will be as clear as mud.

Quotation 23.—"Electricity is not a fluid, but an element of mortal mind—the thought essence that forms the link between what is termed matter and mortal mind. The grosser sub-stratum is named matter, the more ethereal is called human mind, which is the nearer counterfeit of the immortal mind—and hence the more accountable and sinful belief."

How wonderful is metaphysics! Like a weather-vane, it turns every way the wind blows. You see, electricity is an element of that which has no existence i. e., mortal mind,—the thought essence that forms the link between what is termed matter and mortal mind, neither of which has any existence. The human or mortal mind which has no existence is, however, accountable and sinful and the nearer counterfeit of the immortal mind. Nothing could possibly be plainer.

Quotation 24.—"How can I believe there is no such thing as matter when I weigh over two hundred pounds and daily carry about this weight?" Mrs. Eddy answered: "By learning that matter is but manifested mortal mind. You entertain an adipose belief of your sense as substance; whereas substance means more than matter, it is the glory and pre-eminence of spirit. Have you never been so preoccupied in thought while moving your body, that you did this without consciousness of its weight?"

How exquisitely elucidated! If there is one thing I like more than another, it is the clear cut explanation of metaphysical perplexities. Now, in the above quotation, the man who asked the question, entertained a fatty belief—adipose, you know, means fatty—of his sense as substance. If his belief had not been so fat, a little leaner, or somewhat on the order of bacon, with a streak of lean running through it, he would not be so constantly reminded of his great weight. There is nothing more exasperating than fatty degeneration of belief.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

DO ANIMALS LIVE AFTER DEATH?

The perpetuation of animal life seems to me to be quite feasible and consistent with the doctrine of immortality. As man is only an animal of higher development I see no reason why the "beasts of the field" should be excluded from the common law of universal progress. The creations of God all the world over are part of himself, and can no more be subject to annihilation than the most infinitesimal atom of dust from which we are supposed to be made. In the ancient days, when man "lorded" it over woman, it was a belief amongst a certain race that the female sex had no soul; that man only was immortal, and that the partner of his joys was only made to gratify his lusts in this life. But modern ladies would resent such a base denial of their spiritual privileges. It is man's selfishness that argues thus.

As a medium I have had many remarkable experiences, and have seen phantasms of birds, lions, dogs, horses, and other forms of animal life. We may not relish the fact, but it is nevertheless true, that "animals are eternal souls." Like the human being, they emerge at death from their shells to begin a new life on a fresh stage of existence; indeed, it is the law of everything in nature. We may exterminate, by physical or mental force, subordinate types of creation, as a certain English king rooted out and destroyed the wolves of ancient Britain, or as civilization made short work of the North American Indians, but the wolf will still prowl through his spiritual forest and the Indian will continue to roam over his happy hunting-grounds in spirit-land.

These savage beliefs have some foundation in fact. Amid the vast deserts and regions of solitude Nature appeals more forcibly to the spiritual instincts of man, and convinces him of the reality of his simple but sublime faith. A world without animal life would be as dull, monotonous, and uninteresting as the "glorious paradise" of the "elect," where nothing but hallelujah choruses, harps, and trumpets blazon forth the happiness of the "Christian" and the triumph of Jehovah over the damned.

RESULT OF ROMAN ENLIGHTENMENT.

I enclose a clipping from the Christian World of February 13, which speaks for itself:

"An amazing illustration of Roman Catholic methods in the darker parts of Europe, and of the dense ignorance and superstition which make them possible, is given in last Thursday's El Cristiano. A letter purporting to emanate from Jesus Christ, and said to have been found in Jerusalem in April 1901, by a boy named Angel, is at present circulating (in copy) in the Spanish Peninsula. Its nature and purpose may be judged from the following extracts: 'My beloved sons, redeemed by my own blood, know that you have offended me so grievously that but for the prayers of my blessed mother, your advocate, and the prayers of all the saints, I would have destroyed you.... Do good to the souls in purgatory..... If you do not attend I tell you that the earth will open and bury you alive.... Any person, no matter what his quality, who shall say that this letter is from the hand of man, and not from the hand of God, shall melt away like salt in water.' This mendacious and blasphemous production bears the name of "The Catholic Press of Madrid," and devout Catholics are encouraged to procure it and carry if about with them by the promise of 300 days of indulgence and plenary indulgence for every Saturday. These favours are said to be conceded by His Holiness Pope Leo XIII. One would have thought that so obvious an imposture would have been at once detected and generally laughed at, but this is not the case in Catholic Spain. The "letter" is eagerly read by numbers, and kept as a precious relic."

May we ask "Scrutor" whether all these centuries of almost exclusive Romish Church rule and teaching in Spain, where they hold their sway over the people, which now results in such a state of dense ignorance as is said to follow from his Church methods according to El Cristiano, is that not a fair measure of the light that is in the said Catholic church teaching of that country, and whether this country would not sink into a like state of gross darkness, where such a thing could be made possible, if they, through time, were allowed to have the same unquestioned church rule over us?

NOT COMPETENT TO DECIDE.

Please allow me to say a word or two to "Scrutor" in reply to his of the 14th. I am glad that he admits the existence of other Christian bodies beside the Roman Catholics; it simplifies things. "Scrutor" mistakes when he says that "Science disposes of Spiritualism as imaginary." Some scientific men deny the truth of Spiritualism; but some scientific men, not the least in standing, affirm the truth of Spiritualism. We have up till now no authoritative decision of science on Spiritualism. We have, however, no scientific mind which will accept the Bible from back to back as God's truth.

I agree with "Scrutor" that on the authority of the Bible, the Pope has the power of interpreting the Bible as he likes, no matter how absurd his decisions may be. It is necessary that it should be so; and that the Roman Catholics should have someone who can decide what is true and what false; or rather what shall be true and what shall be false, because a Roman Catholic is not competent to decide these questions. He may, and does, use his intellect in all matters outside religion, and shines in any department of science and literature he walks in; but in religion he is a mere babe; he dare not call his soul his own; nor dare he assert his manhood against the most absurd statement coming from Rome. Such a human being (I will not call him a man) requires to be kept in leading strings.

There is a charge made against Rome which is true, viz., "that Rome presumptuously assumes to be the sole repository of the powers left by Christ to his disciples."

Whatever power Rome has of binding and loosing and of forgiving sins the other Christian sects have the same. In Matt. xvi:19 Jesus gave the power to Peter of binding in these words: "Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven." Now in Matt. xviii:18 Jesus gave power to the whole of his disciples of binding, etc., in these words: "Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," etc.

These examples show very plainly that every disciple of Christ has the same power of binding, etc., that Rome arrogantly assumes for itself. Moreover, in John xx:23 Jesus expressly gives to all the disciples the power to forgive sins, so that Rome (Peter) has not exclusive power in this respect. Moreover, as Jesus in Matt. xviii:19 says to his disciples, "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask it shall be done for them of my Father in heaven. For where two or three are gathered in my name there am I in the midst of them." It legitimately follows that any two persons in the church of Rome wishing to alter its ceremonies and creed can do so, and still be Christians, no matter how absurd the alteration is.

As "Scrutor" asks someone to show that the charges brought against Rome are true, I bring the charge that the Pope professes to be a believer in Christ, and he is not. If the Pope believes in Christ, can he take up serpents, drink deadly things, heal the sick by laying on hands? Mark, in 16th chapter, verse 17, says that "these signs shall follow them that believe." Now I can charge the Pope with not being a believer. In case "Scrutor" says that these words are only figurative, I answer that Paul showed he could do them, and also that there are abundant proofs that the early Christians could give these signs of belief.

If there is one thing which shows that the Bible is of human origin, or has been tampered with by men, it is this power of "binding and loosing, and of forgiving sins." The Pope can exercise that power legitimately according to the Bible. So also can any two persons who have been baptized by a disciple, by the Greek church, by the Anglican church, by the Wesleyan, etc. The mistake in the Pope is not in assuming that power, but in assuming to have that power exclusively.

The reason why so many sects and peoples attack Rome is because the creed of Rome is liberty-destroying, soul-enslaving. The most faithful nations and people to Rome are the least able to govern themselves. Unable to think for their own soul's welfare, they lack that noblest attribute to civilization, "self-control." Babes in the care of their souls, they are the creatures of impulse. No wonder Papacy is despised. It is asserted that when Roman Catholics get into the United States they leave the pale of Romanism and look after their own spiritual welfare.

I have argued as if the Bible was true entirely, which I cannot admit it to be. I have tried to show from the Bible, assuming it to be true, that the Pope is only one of many possessing these powers. Believing that the Book has been tampered with, I look upon it as a fallacious foundation for any dogmatic creed. It is, however, good enough for people who dare not think—Roman Catholics. As "Scrutor" asked for the opinions of your readers, I have given mine.

MAN'S CONCEPTION OF GOD

What the Secular Press Is Doing for the Thinking Class.

Relative to man's strange conception of God we find the following editorial in the Chicago American and reproduce it for our readers to ponder on, as to the advance thought upon the God question from a secular source:

Tens of thousands of volumes—millions, perhaps—have been written in the attempt to formulate and describe the personality of God.

Every human mind which has devoted its feeble powers to this vast problem, to the study of the universe and its Ruler, has attributed HUMAN QUALITIES to God. Invariably we have imagined that an individual, a being more or less like ourselves, differing from us only in greater wisdom and power, rules and directs the universe.

A few philosophical minds have pointed out the preposterousness of our vanity, which ascribes to God qualities in ourselves.

Spinoza, undoubtedly the most wonderful among Jewish intellects, said in a delightfully sarcastic letter to a solemn town clerk named Boxel:

"I believe that a triangle, if it could speak, would say that God is eminently triangular, and a circle that the divine nature is in an eminent degree circular."

At another time he wrote a prosperous merchant named Blyenberg, who was trying vainly to understand Spinoza's philosophy:

"It is as little use to ascribe to God the properties that make a man perfect as if one should ascribe to man such as belong to the perfection of the elephant or the ass."

The philosophers themselves, the RELATIVELY perfect minds of our little civilization, have nothing to say save that it is preposterous for us little earth parasites to ascribe to God our own qualities, including even our DEFECTS, such as love of vengeance and hatred. These philosophers can offer no conception of the power, so vast, which rules us.

The ancient Hebrews, perhaps better than any others, expressed reverence for God, and they never even allowed themselves to pronounce his name.

These random observations printed here are called forth by the publication of a most exquisitely ludicrous, conceited statement by the late Cecil Rhodes.

This giant of the earth was pleased to say in regard to the existence of God: "Agnoseo; I don't know." He was not quite sure that that settled the matter, however, and he added:

"Is it not at least THINKABLE that there are intelligences in the universe as much my superior in intellect as I am superior to the dog?"

No funnier question than that could ever be asked.

There are at present ON EARTH intelligences as superior to that of Cecil Rhodes as was his to the dog, or even to the potato bug.

A good dog—brave, devoted, faithful in friendship, ambitious in the hunt, alert at watching property confided to him—does not compare by any means unfavorable with many distinguished human beings.

And poor Cecil Rhodes, a little human microbe, struggling to steal a little land away from some black creatures in Africa, thinks that he compliments divine wisdom when he says that there MAY BE in the universe intelligences as superior to his as his is to that of a dog.

Herbert Spencer has expressed the belief that on other planets there undoubtedly lived intelligent beings as far above the most intelligent human in brain as was Newton above a black beetle.

But Herbert Spencer never thought of establishing any comparisons between a HUMAN BEING and the wisdom by which the universe is controlled.

Absolute self-confidence is said to be the keynote of success in this life.

No wonder Cecil Rhodes succeeded when he believed that only a very small distance separated his brain from that of the greatest in the universe.

It must be pleasing to be so ignorant, to enjoy such charming freedom from any sense of self-limitation.

Seers of the Ages.

This large volume of 400 pages (9th edition), treats exhaustively of the seers, sages, prophets and inspired men of the past, with records of their visions, trances and intercourse with the spirit world. This is considered a standard work, treating of God, heaven, hell, faith, repentance, prayer, baptism, judgment, demoniac spirits, etc. Price reduced from $2 to $1.25. Postage 15 c.

Spiritual Harp.

A book of 300 pages, containing songs, hymns and anthems for Spiritualist societies and circles. The words are afire with progress. It contains the choicest songs and music by James G. Clark and other reformers. Reduced from $2 to $1.25.

India and Her Magic.

Who Are These Spiritualists and What Is Spiritualism?

This pamphlet of over 40 pages proves that the greatest and brainest men in the world to-day, such as Sir Wm. Crookes and hundreds of others are Spiritualists. Price 15 cents.

Dr. Peebles' Three Jubilee Lectures.

A most elegantly bound pamphlet of 122 pages, giving Dr. Peebles' lectures delivered in Hydesville, March 31, 1898, in Rochester, and later in London at the International Congress of Spiritualists. These lectures, illustrated, are racy, meaty and scholarly. Price 35 cents.

The Christ Question Settled.

A symposium by Hudson Tuttle, W. E. Coleman, Rabbi Wise, Col. Ingersoll, J. S. Loveland, B. B. Hill, J. R. Buchanan and Dr. Peebles. This is a handsome volume of nearly 400 pages, and treats of Jesus, Mahomet and the gnostics. What the Talmud says about Jesus. Antiquity unveiled. Child marriage in India. Col. Ingersoll's agnosticism. What the spirits through W. J. Colville, J. J. Morse, Mrs. Longley, Mrs. Everitt, Mrs. Hagan-Jackson and other mediums say about Jesus, etc. Price $1.25.

A Critical and Crushing Review

By Dr. Peebles of the Rev. Dr. Kipp's five lectures against Spiritualism. This crisp and critical reply of the Doctor, while repudiating spiritism, and all frauds connected with the subject, sustains Spiritualism, considering it the complement of primitive Christianity. Price 25 cents.

Hell Revised, Modernized.

And made more comfortable. A scathing review of the Rev. Dr. Kipp's sermon delivered in the Presbyterian church, upon "What Is Hell?" By Dr. J. M. Peebles. A pamphlet of 25 pages. Price 10 cents.

The Soul—Did It Pre-exist?

Did it begin to exist with the body? Is it evolved from the body? Did it ascend up through all the lower orders of creation, or is it a potentialized portion of God? Has it been re-incarnated, or re-embodied? Price 15 cents.

Pro and Con of Spiritualism.

This pamphlet is a re-print of the essays in "The Arena" on Spiritualism in which Rev. H. A. Hart endeavored to prove Spiritualism dangerous and allied to witchcraft. The reply printed in "The Arena" written by Dr. Peebles excited extensive comment, and is absolutely crushing. Price reduced to 5 cents.

Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

An elegant pamphlet containing an account of the exercises at Rochester and Hydesville, N. Y., at the celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. It contains the addresses of some of the most noted speakers present. It contains the picture of the Hydesville cottage, wreath, etc., Price 15 cents.

Death Defeated, or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young.

This book goes to the foundation of things—health, the laws of health, the foods to eat, the subject of marriage, who should marry and who should not marry; the causes of divorce, the proper time for conception, gestation, the determining of sex, animal flesh-eating, what Herodotus, Hesiod, Homer, Pythagoras, Shelley, Graham and others ate, the foods that produce long life and how to live "immortal" on earth, etc. This book is written in Dr. Peebles' usually clear, crisp style, and attracts the reader from the very first through its facts, logic and convincing arguments. Very handsomely bound in cloth. Price $1.

This finely illustrated volume of between three hundred and four hundred pages, by Dr. Peebles, treats exhaustively of inoculation, cow-pox and calf-lymph vaccination from Jenner's time to the present. It tells how the cow-pox pus poison is obtained—how the vaccine virus, while causing many deaths, sows the seed of eczema, pimpled faces, cancers, tumors, ulcers and leprosy. It gives a history of the several years' battle against vaccination in England, Parliament making it "optional" instead of compulsory. This book should be in every school library and family. Price $1.25.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 270 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by this wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

Longley's Beautiful Songs

For Public Meetings and the Home.

VOLUME ONE

Contains the following songs with music:

I'm thinking, dear mother, of you. We miss our boys at home. The land of the bye and bye. The good times yet to be. The land beyond the stars. They are waiting at the portal. When the dear ones gather at home. Resting under the daisies. The grand jubilee. My mother's tender eyes. Dear heart, come home. Come in some beautiful dream. Where the roses never fade. In heaven we'll know our own.

VOLUME TWO

Contains 15 new and beautiful songs, suited to the home circle, seances, local meetings, mass-meetings, conventions, anniversaries and jubilees. They comprise an excellent variety of poems set to easy harmony and ought to sell readily. These books are 15cts. each; the two for 30cts. For sale at this office.

ORIGIN OF SPECIES,

By means of natural selection, or the preservation of a favored race in the struggle for life. By Charles Darwin. Gilt top, cloth bound. This book is the grandest achievement of modern scientific thought and research. It has passed through many editions in English, has been translated into almost all the languages of Europe, and has been the subject of more reviews, pamphlets and separate books than any other volume of the age. Most of the great scientists of the age fully support its position. The thought of this book has become a part of the common inheritance of the race. For sale at this office. Price 75 cts.

Man the Microcosm.

His Infinite and Divine Relations. Intuition—The Light Within. By Giles B. Stebbins. Price, 10 cents.

Jewish Sabbath Is Dead.

"The Sabbath of the Jews is dead. Let us bury it. God never ordained the Sabbath day. It is an institution of man. Only millionaires and peddlers can observe the Jewish Sabbath in these days of activity. Sunday to all intents and purposes already has become our day of rest. The inspiration of the Sabbath can be restored only by participating in the flood of life about us and recognizing as our day of rest the day set apart by the nations in which we live."

These declarations were made by Dr. Emil G. Hirsch in the course of a sermon at Israel Temple, in which he urged the substitution by the Jews of Sunday for the Sabbath of the decalogue.

"Sentiment must be thrown to the four winds," he said, "and we must realize that it has come to be with us a question of economic and industrial life or economic and industrial death. We have no right to put aside opportunity to do good for others simply because sentiment demands that we remain idle on a day of activity. No lawyer has the right to place his client's freedom in jeopardy because his sentiment will not permit him to go to court on Saturday. No merchant has the right to imperil his independence by closing his store on the Jewish Sabbath.

"There has been much loose talk in this country lately about the tyranny of the Sabbath laws. I am not here to defend the blue laws of New England, but I can say that the sound sense behind those narrow and bigoted laws has preserved the manhood of the people. The Sabbath sentiment has thrown around the American workman the rampart of protection. It has given him what no other laboring man on earth has—the feeling that on one day out of seven he is a free man, free from the shackles of slavery."

After urging that the Sabbath institution has been the cause of preserving the lives of the persecuted Jews, whom he called "heroes," for more than fifteen centuries, Dr. Hirsch pleaded for the adoption of Sunday as the Jew's Sabbath.

"I do not quarrel with the man or woman who believes that God in heaven declared that the last day of the week should be set aside as a day for rest and worship," he said, "but the seventh day was not ordained by God as the Sabbath day. Religion and all of its institutions are for men to decide and not for God. Religion is for man and not for God. God does not need us. Religion is for man and not man for religion.

"The Sabbath was not made in heaven; it is an institution of earth. It is the outgrowth of the yearnings of the soul. The Jews being in the majority in Palestine set apart Saturday, the seventh day, yet they might as well have selected Monday or any other day. The decalogues say that God made the world in six days and rested the seventh. 'God resting' is a human figure. Can you conceive of God resting? But it is meant simply in the decalogue that we should take one day of rest—a seventh day.

"For ages the Sabbath of the Jews was the universal Sabbath. Then it was changed to Sunday to make the day not as a day of rest but of resurrection. We cannot ever reconcile ourselves to the doctrine of the resurrection of Christ, but others who do not hold to that belief recognize Sunday as the universal day of rest and observe it as such. The Sunday has to all intents and purposes become our day of rest, it lacks only the one element of moral consecration and inspiration.

"Our Sabbath is a dead institution. Only the millionaire and the peddler can observe it. The millionaire stays at home and transacts his business over the telephone, and in that way seeks to hoodwink himself, and even God, if God could be hoodwinked. It would be an excellent idea for us to preach in graphophones and let our sermons be sent to the homes of the business men before they start for their places of business on the Sabbath day. They will never be heard unless we do something of that sort."

A Nucleus.

We would that Spiritualists might fully realize that the children trained in the Progressive Lyceum are the Spiritualists and reformers of the future. For this reason it were well that the spiritual energy of the Spiritualists of every locality were concentrated on its lyceum. Around the lyceum as a nucleus their thoughts should gather.

The Sunday-Schools of the churches are doing more for the churches than all the preachers are doing by their sermons. But for their Sunday-Schools the churches would speedily die. It is the indoctrination of the minds of children that molds them into material for church membership. Without this training they could as a rule never be brought to accept the dogmas embodied in orthodox creeds.

Should not Spiritualists be quick to learn a most valuable lesson from this? Should they not feel that they are sadly derelict in duty if they neglect to cultivate this most promising and fruitful field, when it means so much to Spiritualism?

But the complete Progressive Lyceum is not entirely devoted to the culture of the minds of children. People of mature and well cultured minds can find interesting and profitable exercise for their thinking faculties, that will quicken, enliven, and enlarge the field of vision in spiritual things and matters that pertain to Spiritualism in its varied phases and relations to the present and future well-being of humanity.

Each Spiritualist should feel that internal growth is the best method of Spiritualism. In the lyceum they can become teachers unto themselves. Let this be done, and then will lecturers be better appreciated, and their work be far more effective and beneficial.

Spiritualism being widely different from orthodox religion or religious beliefs, demands a different educational process—a different course of study, lessons different in substance and nature. It demands the putting aside of the dogmas that constitute the foundation of the orthodox churches and which belie human nature and contravene true principles of ethics. The orthodox ideas concerning God, Atonement, Salvation, etc., have no place in Spiritualism, or in its teachings or philosophy. It is a grievous wrong to children to allow their minds to be educated into such outlandish notions as are the stock teachings in orthodox Sunday-Schools.

The moral efficacy of a good Progressive Lyceum is beyond computation. The lessons learned in the lyceum do not have to be unlearned later in life. The cultivation of the whole being, physical, mental and spiritual, is the work of the lyceum.

Mrs. Clara Watson and Rev. Moses Hull.

They have been discussing educational matters, theology, etc., in The Progressive Thinker. Their remarks have been decidedly pointed and pungent, and have had a puncturing tendency, yet no vital part of their respective organizations have been lacerated to any great extent. Judging from Mrs. Watson's statement, Mr. Hull is far from being what he ought to be; and viewing Mrs. Watson from Mr. Hull's standpoint, she is very deficient in certain essentials. We assure our readers, however, that appearances are deceiving in connection with their respective communications. Mrs. Watson is a genuine lady, highly esteemed by all, while Mr. Hull is a gentleman in every sense of the word. With these remarks the discussion ends.

"The Heresy Trial of Rev. B. F. Austin, M. A., D. D. Giving a sketch of Dr. Austin's life, story of the heresy trial, copy of the charges, the heresy sermon, the scene at conference, and Dr. Austin's full address defending his views on Spiritualism at the London Annual Conference at Windsor, Can." etc. Price 15 cents. For sale at this office.

Asserting the Existence of a Spirit Body=

From the Mountain Top.

The Chicago Record-Herald says that away in a dark room at the University of Chicago is a huge machine which, it is predicted, will prove that miracles are possible. The contrivance is technically known as a ruling engine. It weighs almost a ton and its construction cost $35,000.

For several years Professor Albert Michelson, of the department of physics of the university, has worked almost incessantly on the machine. To no one except a few of his friends has he said anything concerning it. When he has completed experiments which he is now making he will tell the scientific world a few things about matter and its relation to life that will cause theologians as well as savants to do some deep pondering.

Professor Michelson's ruling machine is the second that has ever been built in this country. The other one is at Johns Hopkins University, but it is much smaller than the Michelson engine, hence has been unable to prove what the Chicago contrivance is expected to.

The proofs which the ruling engine is expected to produce will be wholly along comparative lines. It is of such delicate construction that it can measure rays of light, and particles that can be seen only through a microscope lens. It measures the width of a hair as easily as though the hirsute appendage was as large as an oak tree.

By means of this power the machine will lead its owner into realms that have heretofore never been explored by science. It will show that a speck of dust is a world within itself, and that the infinitesimal has no known end just as space is indefinite.

These complicated assertions lead up to the proposition that the truth of miracles can be proved. The Michelson engine demonstrates a well-known theory in philosophy—that matter is not solid, but is composed of atoms which are constantly in motion.

If you touch a crowbar you are not touching a solid body, according to the ruling engine, for, by measurements, it proves that a child's hand placed upon a bar of iron causes the bar to bend. Of course this bending is only the millionth part of an inch, but still the machine records it and thus proves that iron is not solid.

Right here the X-ray machine comes in as an assistant of the ruling engine to this extent: If rays of light can penetrate iron, why could not an ethereal body do the same thing?

Professor Michelson's friends who have conversed with him concerning his machine say he has argued along this line with them. The argument is that if there is no such thing as matter, the Savior could have performed many of the miracles related in the Bible. In talking to one of his friends on this subject Professor Michelson said:

"Oh, these ministers! Why don't they take a course in science as well as a course in theology? It would put them into a mental attitude which would, at least to all intents and purposes, be orthodox. When eminent students of religion say there are no miracles, and that miracles are impossible, and that they are incompatible with science, they say more than we students and professors of science would dare to say.

"And yet, if we were to come out boldly, over our own signatures, and say that we believe, not essentially and specifically in recorded miracles, for then the question of the authenticity of the record is a prime element in the case, but in the possibility of what are called miracles, even to the control, under proper conditions, of matter by mind or mental energy, our statement would be misunderstood, warped, distorted. We would be assailed by collegians and laymen alike."

In explaining his engine Professor Michelson said:

"A broad definition of the immediate purpose of the ruling engine, and one that will be understood by scientific readers or students, and that will be easily grasped after a non-technically scientific explanation is that certain scientific lines of measurement called gratings, and hitherto employed in the analysis of the solar spectrum, which is to say in the analysis of light, and the reply to the question? What is light? are now to be employed, through their results, in preparing the way for an analysis of matter, and the reply to the question, What is matter?

"The word gratings is an old word in the vocabulary of science, and men have for many years been using the gratings in measuring sunbeams, which one would think, would be a much more ethereal pastime than measuring matter through ascertaining the distances between its vibrating particles. People utter the words spectral analysis glibly and easily. And yet if you were to suggest that a certain apparition or manifestation was spectral, they would immediately associate it with a phenomenon.

"Mankind has been for so many years and centuries taught to believe that matter is solid, and that light is not, that even the piercing between particles by means of a ray of light, which ray can itself be analyzed, makes only a faint impression on the human mind, while the statement, less wonderful, if anything, that matter is not any more solid than water, excepting in degree, and that under certain conditions matter can pass through matter, would be received with incredulity.

"But if you could effect a physical separation of your particles corresponding to the separation of the particles that the X-ray seems to effect, then you could pass through a door as easily as the X-ray can.

TWENTY THOUSAND LINES TO AN INCH.

"The ruling engine can detect, discern, and draw from fifteen to twenty thousand lines to an inch. In the old school tables the number of lines given to the inch is only twelve. Twenty thousand lines to an inch cannot easily be imagined. The most realistic way in which to give the brain a chance of testing its capacity in the study of the infinitesimal is to make a personal test, and to ascertain how many fine lines you can rule in an inch, or to ask an artist, working with the keenest-edged graving tools, how many fine lines he can make under the microscope.

"In ruling 20,000 fine lines to an inch of space absolute and flawless nicety is required. The result of the rulings is useless if one of these lines, so fine that you cannot imagine one of them, should be displaced by as little as one one-hundredth thousandth part of the distance between two of the lines."

COMPARED WITH WAVES OF LIGHT.

The most important part of the ruling engine is a long screw, the threads of which are extremely minute. This screw was made at the university. Professional makers of screws, of sensitive accuracy, failed in their attempts to construct this part of the Michelson instrument, but their failure gave the University of Chicago an opportunity for a notable triumph, and for the establishment of a record.

The screw, by a method of comparison invented by Dr. Michelson, is compared with the wave lengths of the light that radiate from the sun. The distances between the two threads of the screw are the same all over. Those distances are tested by comparing them with the light waves. Roland, who was a pioneer in this study, used a microscope to test the space between the threads of a screw. Of course, the microscope has to use the light waves too, but Michelson's methods are much more sensitive.

It takes three or four days of constant work on the part of the engine to get one accurate ruling, or grating. During this time the ruling engine works continuously, and it works alone in a dark room or cellar, to which only one beam of light, that which is to assist in the making of the "gratings," is admitted. Although no one can enter the room with the ruling engine while it is at work, it has to be inspected from time to time, in order to see that the conditions of successful operation have not been interfered with.

This inspection is made through a tiny, glass-covered peep hole in the door. A single breath would spoil the experiment by interfering with the accuracy of the space measurement or "grating" obtained. The importance of regulating the temperature for the ruling engine is very great. The difference or variation of one-quarter of a degree will spoil an experiment. Therefore, an exceedingly delicate governing device is used to keep the temperature of the room constant.

ETHEREAL BODY POSSIBLE?

Although neither science nor scientific men can be held responsible for the lines of thought that is immediately suggested by the results of the work of the ruling engine, yet there is a temptation to arrive at the conclusion, which indeed is sanctioned by eminent authorities and encyclopedia writers, that there might exist an ethereal body, an entity, distinct and recognizable, and capable of volition, motion, and thought, and yet able to penetrate matter, to pass through doors and walls, for instance. Therefore, the expression, an ethereal vision, might mean something, after all. An ethereal bodily entity, distinct and recognizable, could pass through matter as easily as water passes through a sieve, filtering through between the minute spaces that exist between the vibrating particles of matter.

In view of this, some phrases that are used in the Bible assume a new interest. For instance, it is asserted that the reference to a natural body and a spiritual body may be literal, and not metaphorical, and indeed there is nothing in the context to indicate that it is metaphorical.

When Professor Michelson was asked to explain his ruling engine he said that at present it was too early to go into the details of the way the machine works.

"It has not been entirely completed yet," he said, "and will not be finished for several months. I can say, however, that already I have obtained some wonderful results from it."

Here we have a wonderfully suggestive demonstration tending to prove the existence of an ethereal body. Prof. Michelson is standing on the mountain top, and surveying the scenes below him, he is able to give expression to a grand thought in a machine. As McE. says in the Chicago Chronicle,

He who ascends the mountain tops shall find
The loftiest peaks most wrapt in clouds and snow;
He who surpasses or subdues mankind
Must look down on the hate of those below.

Have you ever climbed to the mountain top? If you have you will recall that, while the task was laborious, each step that brought you nearer the summit increased the pleasure, added to the exhilaration, whetted the appetite for further climbing, trained the muscles for more signal achievement, and made every fiber of the body tingle with new life and buoyancy.

Perhaps it was your first climb to the top. How often you rested, debating whether you should continue or retrace your steps. It proved so much harder than it had seemed from the valley below. You craned your neck this way and that endeavoring to measure the distance between you and the desired goal, and you looked down on the easy level stretches of your ordinary walks with something of regret that you had ever been tempted to leave them.

But you persevered, and at last, panting, every muscle aching, temples throbbing as though they would burst, but with it all the supreme satisfaction of having gained the end you sought, you reached the summit. If you were wise you did not at once look about you. You waited until the physical turmoil had quieted somewhat, till the rugged trials of climbing had been partly or altogether forgotten.

Then, standing to the full height with which nature had blessed you, and every minute growing taller, you slowly swept the distant horizon with your eyes. Nearer details you took in later, but the first glance was the widest within your range, and by this standard you measured everything else. With the breadth of vision, with the miles of rarefied atmosphere all about you, you experienced a feeling of wonderful mental expansion, you forgot the level monotony of the valley and of the plain, the narrow regularity of the city streets. The petty architecture of man faded from your memory and in its place came the sublime architecture of nature. Everything base and narrow and trivial in you bowed in subjection to the godlike qualities that rose to meet the godlike all around you.

But perhaps you say: "I never have climbed a mountain because I never have been near one. I have lived on the plain or in the valley all my life. I know nothing of your broad views and rare atmosphere. I have grown used to the levels. Would you have me seek a mountain, scale its heights, and forever after be discontented with the plain and the valley?"

That is precisely the point to which this bit of fancy has been leading. Few who have ever caught the view from the mountain top have been wholly content in the valley thereafter. Up near the snow line, yet not above the clouds, they grew too large for a narrower horizon.

A TREASURE OF FANCY.

And when they fretted at the confining limits of the ordinary paths which life compelled them to tread and could not go to the mountain top in fact they climbed once more in fancy and saw beyond the humdrum, everyday things the blue line of distant hills, the haze of a far-off sea, the sinuous course of mighty rivers, the illimitable forests, the giant slopes, the footprints of the Great Spirit that once moved on the face of the waters before the mountains and the plains were born.

There are mountains which anybody can climb. They are just as difficult to scale as those which the mighty hand of nature has reared, and the view from the top is just as broad—broader, in fact, for it is limited only by the infinite. There is a mental mountain top for every person, just as there is a mental valley and a mental plain. These mountains are not all the same height, for one person can go higher than another, just as in ordinary mountain climbing.

Some are capped continually with clouds; some bask in perpetual sunshine. These latter are the most attractive; they may be scaled by the greatest number; they afford the best views; they are the most practical. It may be well to go above the clouds now and then, but it is not good to remain there always. One should climb the mental mountain just high enough to have a horizon line—that is, if he wish to keep in touch with the things of the valley and the plain.

WHERE THOUGHT BROADENS.

And when this mental mountain top has been once reached the valley will no longer be satisfying. This condition, however, is necessary in order to get above the petty, narrow, dwarfing things of life. From this mountain top thought will spread its pinions and soar like the eagle away into the blue vestibule of the infinite; judgment will adopt a higher standard and a kindlier cast than it ever knew on the lower levels; that charity which beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things, will become still more divine; aspiration will seek its source, leading the soul gently into a purer ether.

From this mountain top we judge our fellows broadly and kindly. Up there in the sunshine and the pure air life shows us more of its general plan; we are not limited by a mass of detail. Down below us are petty strivings, little envies, narrow jealousies, but on the mountain top sits calm reason, clear-eyed judgment and broad charity.

Everyone should have a mental mountain top and he should climb it often. All his judgments should be formed there; all his criticisms should be made there; all questions of right and wrong should be settled there. Life should be gauged and directed from the mountain top and not from the valley. It is the point of view that makes us broad or narrow, noble or mean, great or small, generous or selfish. The narrower the view the narrower the life; the broader the view the broader the life. Take, then, your views from high mental altitudes and life will have a high purpose. And bring the memory of these views into the valley with you, so that others by your example may be persuaded to climb as you have climbed and to judge as you have judged.

The gods of ancient Greece did not dwell on the plains of Thessaly, but amid the eternal spring of Olympus.

All great men, stand, as it were, on the mountain top, whether a Morse, a Tesla, Edison or Michelson; no one can be great without standing there; no one can compass the grandeur of creation unless he has access thereto.

Independent Spiritualism.

Spiritualism came without asking the world if it was ready for it; in fact, came without giving the world time to fix up for its reception. It had not asked the church if it was ready to welcome its kind of religion and philosophy; it asked no Talmage, or any other great divine to lift his voice in praise of its birth. It merely came to relate a fact and prove it. It came to answer the world's prayer, to verify a dream of immortality that had been dreamed and re-dreamed, recited and re-recited for hundreds of years with only the mildewed records of a remote past as the basis for the dream.

Spiritualism pushed the silent doors wide open and showed the world a truth they yearned for but have been reluctant to acknowledge. But the truth has come to stay, and as it pushed the doors back it moved the old hell and devil of superstition and ignorance back with the dark age in which they belong and brought forth a new heaven, a new God, apparently a new life, and sweet peace to all who can grasp its principles; it has even inspired the world's religions with new hope. It has improved the thinking capacity of the people and made them outgrow the creeds, compelling the churches to modify their articles of faith to fit, or almost fit the advanced minds of a thinking world. It has embellished the human form with an enlightened soul, and snapped the binding cords of mental slavery and widened the path of man's possibilities; it has grasped the outstretched hand of Providence and placed it in the hand of science, and Nature's world has grown wiser.

Independent Spiritualism loves the world and calls all the planets her own; calls all the forces of the universe one active, living, moving, corelated energy; brings mind into harmony with matter; asks no man to become accountable for the actions of another and holds no personality responsible for the indiscriminate slaughter of human beings any more than for the upheaval of the earth and uplifting of the trees.

It is young, but has grown beyond the crawling period of development and walks uprightly among other institutions of reform; among the churches and the sciences; among the factors, among the wheels in the machinery of politics, but it has no university for the graduation and perfection of Spiritualists in Spiritualistic lore.

There may be a limit to the unfoldment of some human brains, but not to the advancement of the principles of Spiritualism.

Fads and fancies and flaring illuminations may flash out upon the morning light of its great truth, and go down with the sun in the evening and become lost in the gloaming, but Spiritualism will continue its onward march, and spirits of the departed will communicate with their friends upon the earth without the consent of orthodoxy, heterodoxy, Christian Science, Theosophy or Agnosticism.

If Spiritualism is a religion it must base its belief in the existence of an Infinite Intelligence upon a fact, as it presumes to deal with facts only.

If Spiritualism be not a science, and is dependent upon science for its basic proof, then it is but a deduction of science, an explainable fact.

The rank and file do not seem discouraged when some one discovers something better, something grander and higher, for themselves, and upon that "rock" found a church or a society, or university.

There is room in the world for all and Spiritualism is broad enough and large enough to hug them to her motherly bosom and help them to arise and unfold, to become wise, just, charitable and broad.

Divine Providence and Locusts.

According to the New York Herald, Professor B. Smith, of Rutgers College, in New Brunswick, N. J., and State Entomologist for New Jersey, whose crusade against mosquitoes has made him prominent, has another insect brood under his attention. In the forest and orchard lands of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and other states, the periodical cicada, or "seventeen year locusts," are slowly maturing and about June 1 will leave their beds for flight.

This insect, of which Professor Smith has some fine specimens, is a most curious creature. It is from an inch to an inch and a half long, the body being dark, while the wings are glassy with delicately defined veins. The eyes are orange color. With the exception of butterflies, there are scarcely any insects known that are more beautiful.

The locusts from which this year's brood is due last appeared in 1885, and attacked young trees. The tender shoots were split and in the cavities eggs were deposited. The trees attacked were killed and the falling branches left the eggs in the ground. There, for seventeen years, the insects have been developing.

Professor Smith has just received a bottle full of specimens taken from the ground near Baltimore, where the insects mature about two weeks earlier than in New Jersey. The wings of these specimens have just begun to appear.

By June 1 the brood in New Jersey will leave the earth, and those in New York a little later. Millions upon millions of the insects will attack trees to deposit their eggs. For a month the ravages will continue; then the cicada will disappear almost as suddenly as it arrived.

The creatures do not live long after depositing eggs. Their short month of life after seventeen years of inactivity is devoted entirely to the perpetuation of the species.

The last big invasion of the cicada was in 1894. This, of course, was a different brood from the one due this year, and its successor will arrive in 1911. These two broods are the largest known in New Jersey.

"The present brood," says Professor Smith, "will extend throughout New Jersey, the southern part of New York, the northern part of Pennsylvania and westward about to the Mississippi, and more or less south.

"In New York State the insects will be most plentiful along the Hudson river, and in New Jersey along the Delaware. Warnings have been issued to fruit raisers in New Jersey not to set out any young trees this spring because of the coming of the insects.

"There are twenty-one known broods of cicada in this country. The colonies in the North appear at intervals of seventeen years, while those in the South develop every thirteen years. I look for the cicada to appear about Memorial Day."

Here is an extensive field for scientists to explore, to determine the connection of Divine Providence with these locusts that work such devastation and ruin among farmers. It has been customary in the dark medieval past, to ascribe everything to a "special providence," thereby making God the creator of all the pestiferous animals in existence, and in a measure responsible for the mischief they cause. Would it not be well for scientists to investigate more closely the relationship, if any exists, between poisonous insects and an Infinite God of Love and Charity? Such research would prove highly interesting.

The Eves of Theology.

The tempest is still raging in the theological teapot and the air is hazy with the steamy mists that escape from the super-heated enclosure.

It is the war between the "higher criticism" and the element of rock-bottomed, iron-bound religious conservatism; merely another phase of the everlasting conflict between stand-still old-fogyism and the forces that make for progress.

The theological progressists may well be likened to Eves of theology, who are ever ready to listen to the persuasive voice that tempts them to partake of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, which has been forbidden and interdicted by the conservative law-giving, authorities of the church, under pains and penalties of excommunication from the churchly Eden.

By means of their disobedience the area of knowledge is extended, and they pass the fruit on to others, and the whole world of theology is thereby becoming infected with freedom of thought and consequent insubordination to all forces and powers that would shackle mind in the pursuit of truth, and prevent full and free investigation, and free expression of thought.

This theological agitation is one of the healthiest signs of the times. It shows that truth-loving minds are overcoming the warping influence of churchly education, and though still in the dark respecting many important truths, such as are embodied in Spiritualism, their faces are set toward the dawning sun whose rays will yet liberate them from all bondage to medieval theological notions.

As long as the world has Eves, it will progress in knowledge.

Spirituality, Good Morals and Eye Glasses.

According to dispatches from New York, the question, "Do eyeglasses really cure bad temper?" was answered by Dr. Max P. E. Groszmann. He enunciated a theory at the last meeting of the celebrated Mothers' Club in that leading city, and hundreds apparently agree with him.

Right on the heels of Dr. Groszmann's unique speech, a United States Senator flew into a rage and slashed a Washington street car conductor with a knife.

A pair of eyeglasses, adherents of the unique theory claim, would have saved the dignified Senator from getting into a street brawl and cutting a street car employe with his knife. Senator Money, according to the reports, is suffering with an irritating trouble with his eyes. The affliction has made him petulant, and to it friends ascribe the many violent outbursts of temper in which the otherwise able and well-poised Senator has indulged to the detriment of his reputation.

If he had the right sort of glasses he would be able to see things in their right light and the damage to his temper would be repaired. At least, that's what the followers of Dr. Groszmann's school assert.

Dr. Groszmann is a very eminent specialist, who has made a study of the treatment of defectives and of the causes of "atypical development." By "atypical development" is meant the impairment of some one of the senses.

"The fitting of glasses is often a remedy for mental and moral deficiency. Glasses and a tonic have cured many a case of bad temper.

"Neurotic children are often mistaken for budding genii and ruined by injudicious parents.

This is the theory which Dr. Groszmann advanced before the Mothers' Club and which aroused great interest. He has been talking about atypical children and how they should be treated. He has made a special study of the subject and is the author of a pamphlet on "The Treatment of Defectives."

In speaking of his theory Dr. Groszmann said:

"It is true that defects of vision often cause a great deal of nervous irritation. This alone may be responsible for unhappiness and bad temper. But a child whose visual defects are not recognized is handicapped in many ways. He can not see properly what his parents and teachers suppose he should see, and thus he falls behind in his lessons, does things unsatisfactorily and is often enough scolded and punished when he was really not at fault.

"This will produce resentment and unhappiness. The fitting of glasses in such a case will allow the child to see the world in a different light; he will be enabled to work like the other children; he will no longer be thought lazy or careless or obstinate, and the atmosphere of his home and school life will be cleared up.

"Other physical conditions may have similar mental and moral effects. The removal of adenoid vegetations in the naso-pharyngeal passages often changes an apparently dull child into a boy or girl of ordinary intelligence. Digestive troubles, which are so frequent in childhood, although they are quite as often neglected, produce effects which make the child appear to be possessed by an evil spirit. Many cases of atypical development require the diagnosis and care of the family physician, rather than of the educator as such, or of the specialist for mental diseases.

"Real atypical development is frequent enough, relatively speaking. Reference is here made not only to those children who are slow and backward in mental development, but also to nervous and even to precocious children. The latter require sometimes even more special care than the backward children. But that is another chapter."

There is a grand truth underlying the statements of this eminent physician. While there is constant irritation going on in connection with any organ of the body all the vital forces are more or less disturbed, hence can not have a healthy expression. The constant pricking of a pin, the unremitting pain in a tooth, a festering ulcer on the body, continuous irritation of the eye, or dyspepsia in its worst forms, do not place one in a position where he sees the world in its proper light; everything is more or less distorted. Good health broadens out life in every conceivable direction.

Notes and Reflections

By J. M. Peebles, M. D.

Opening your atlas and casting your eye down southward from Eastern Australia, you will see Tasmania, and Launceston, a lovely city located in the northern part of the island. It nestles in a pretty valley at the head-navigation wasters of the flowing Tamar, and is rimmed around by rugged mountains. So little is known by the masses of America about this city of 25,000 that it might be blotted out by a volcanic eruption or a mighty earthquake and the catastrophe remain unknown a long time to the Chicago press. The inhabitants of this city are mostly English. The streets are kept so exquisitely clean that neither the bubonic plague nor small-pox could here get a footing. These are both dirt diseases. Small-pox is not only increased and intensified by blood-poisoning vaccination, but it lays the system open to eczema, erysipelas, tumors, and cancerous growths. Advanced physicians and the most intelligent of all enlightened lands are becoming more and more convinced of this fact. Tasmania, like England, has the "conscience clause," and vaccination is optional with the people. The same is true of New South Wales and New Zealand. Compulsory vaccination must go, as did bleeding and those old-style drastic doses.

TASMANIA.

As far back on time's dial as 1642 the Governor of Batavia, Anthony van Dieman, sent Mr. Tasman, a sailor citizen, on an exploring expedition into the South Seas. During this voyage he sighted the west coast of this magnificent island. The discovery ultimately immortalized his memory. For some two centuries, however, the island was known as Van Dieman's Land, having been settled in 1803 by military men having in charge a party of convicts. Later the country was named Tasmania, because Van Dieman's Land was associated with the idea of bondage and long-past criminality.

When discovered there were large numbers of natives upon the island, bearing a very strong resemblance to the black bushmen of Australia. Though ignorant of the arts and sciences, they were quiet, peaceful people, living largely by hunting and fishing. Some three hundred of these were out one day driving kangaroos on the hills back of a little settlement called Risdon, when because of a silly panic started by some nervous women, the order was given by an official to fire at them, when quite a number of men, women and children were shot down like dogs, and either wounded or killed. Confidence from this time was shaken, never to be restored. Violence and treachery commenced and nothing short of extermination would satisfy these white-faced "Christians," these omnivorous, meat-eating Dutchmen. And so the last original Tasmanian was swept off from the island some thirty years ago.

When the naturalist, Chas. Darwin, visited this colony on his voyage around the world in 1836, the entire native population numbered but 210. Recently I saw the photograph of the last man of his race. Here is a fine sample of the survival of the fittest by the means of murder; or, in another form, "might makes right."

In writing of this country, Chas. Darwin says: "Van Dieman's Land enjoys the great advantage of being free from the native population," and he might have added, "freed by a brutal and disgraceful civilization, based upon the ethics of the bloody Old Testament." Jehovah is reported to have said, "I am the god of war."

HOBART ON THE DERWENT.

This city, the capital of the State of Tasmania, is charmingly located upon the western shore of the broad-flowing Derwent, and nestles at the foot of Mt. Wellington, which rises as a mighty background between 4,000 and 5,000 feet above sea-level. Tasmania, be it remembered is one of the States constituting the Commonwealth of Australia, and it is noted for its clear, bracing climate, numerous inland lakes, dashing rivers through deep mountain gorges, rich mines and excellent fruits. Great shiploads of apples are yearly forwarded to England. It is reported that the largest tin mine in the world is here located, and one of the gold mines has already distributed over two millins in dividends.

There is nothing heard here of the "unemployed." Tramps and "hoboes" are almost unknown. To me the people seem slow, indifferent and lazy. Shops and offices are not opened till eight and nine o'clock in the morning. Few Hobart Tasmanians ever see the sun rise, and a large majority of the men and boys smoke tobacco. Each of these cities, Launceston and Hobart, has public squares, museums, art galleries, public libraries, parks with native animals and beautiful-plumaged and caged birds. The citizens of Hobart live largely by financially bleeding tourists. Opossum and wallaby rugs cost from twenty to fifty dollars. In 1857 Hobart was first lighted with gas.

Launceston and Hobart have fine harbors, the latter is the best. A railway connects these two competitive cities. The country through which the railway passes is well adapted to pasturage, grain and fruit raising. Launceston's Albert Hall will comfortably seat 2,000 people, and this city certainly manifests the most energy and public spirit. One of the prominent citizens of Hobart said yesterday that this city should be called "Sleepy Hollow."

Tasmania has a University. Hobart has a system of rough, rocking, double-decked electric street-cars, faintly reminding one of San Diego, Califirnia. Hobart is comparatively an old city, having a population of about 40,000.

LAUNCESTON AND SPIRITUALISM.

Corresponding while in Australia with some intelligent gentlemen in Launceston, arranging, and taking passage by the steamer Pateena, we were met at the landing by some liberal-minded parties and conveyed to "Park View," overlooking a lovely park and most of the city. Our course of lectures was delivered in the Mechanic's Institute. They were the first ever given on the Island of Tasmania. The audiences, rather small at first, increased to the end. The last evening the hall was literally packed, Mrs. Locke, a medium, presiding at the piano. Two preachers were present, one of whom was the Wesleyan City Missionary. Introduced to him at the close of the meeting, he expressed great satisfaction at the discourse, admitting that Spiritualism, in the light that I had presented it, was in perfect consonance with primitive Christianity, with its visions, signs, wonders and healing gifts. Many questions were asked me by the audience at the close of the lecture each night. I had a most pleasant interview upon Spiritualism with the Mayor of the city.

Messrs. Lord and Locke, two most devoted Spiritualists, gave us several splendid drives about the suburban resorts of the city. The magnificence of the Great Gorge, wedged in between two mountains, with its dashing cataract, beggars all pen descriptions. Water power is the force that lights the city with electricity. There is here power enough to light the whole island, and that very cheaply. Owing to the personal kindness of friends, our stay in Launceston was most delightful.

HOBART AND SPIRITUALISM.

Leaving our friends in the above-named city, we took the railway train for Hobart, passing through a splendid country of hills and valleys dotted with farm lands and fields of grazing flocks and herds. Reaching Hobart, we repaired to the Imperial Coffee Palace, securing rooms. This hotel is well kept, the table being loaded with beef, mutton and the fried corpses of once living, rooting and grunting hogs. Coffee is seldom seen in these South Sea Islands. The English drink black tea only.

The odor of animal flesh rises from every table, and upon the principle that men grow to be like what they feed upon, both British and Americans have become sufficiently omnivorous to ruffianly fight for and seize every land and isle within their commercial reach. Bulls fight because they are bulls and because they delight to reign supreme over all far-reaching pasture lands. In spite of evolution, the brute that pertains to bulls and dogs is not yet extinct in man.

In Hobart, the capital city of Tasmania, there are a number of progressive minds, free-thinking Materialists, Spiritualists and Theosophists. The latter are organized. They do this where there are seven or more sympathizing with their cult. In this respect they teach Spiritualists a sensible lesson.

Two or three royal-souled Spiritualists in Hobart kindly secured the Masonic Hall for our lecture, the first one ever delivered in the city. The hall, at an early hour, was literally crowded, some standing in the doorway, and others leaving for want of room. There was one English clergyman in the audience. Evidently this was the first gospel sermon that he ever heard. The human soul, however beclouded and besmeared with sectarian creeds, as naturally seeks the truth as does the bud the morning sunshine. Upon this occasion, I gave them strong meat properly seasoned, and made partially palatable by an infusion of Biblical passages, relating to visions, prophecies, signs, healings, and the gift of tongues; insisting, as did Prof. Hare, Robert Dale Owen, the scholastic Brittan, the learned Epes Sargent, Dr. Crowell, Prof. Kiddle, and other brilliant-minded Spiritualists that primitive Christianity, with its spiritual manifestations, and the true Spiritualism of the present were in perfect accord; for, neither God, the Infinite Life and Intelligence of the universe, or the laws of the spirit ever change.

STUDYING THE STARS.

No land in sight for days or weeks, it is delightful to study the stars by night. The study incites reverence. While the North Star faded from my view months ago, Crux, the Southern Cross, glitters brightly in the southern bending skies. Reading up astronomy, and watching the stars these lovely evenings, I have to say, there are only about 3,000 stars, under the most favorable circumstances, visible to the naked eye in night time. Yet, aided by powerful telescopes, astronomers tell us that they have already counted 20,000. These approximate numbers are doubtless infinitely below the real number. Herschell mentions eighteen millions in the milky way, and later observations with the photographic lens brings the number of stars up to 160 millions.

The British Association for the Advancement of Science catalogues 8,277 fixed stars. Stars are divided by the astronomers into classes, or magnitudes, differing in brilliancy. Stars of the first magnitude only are visible to the naked eye. They number about 5,100, but are never all visible at the same time. The stars of the first magnitude may be considered the sign-posts of heaven. It is believed that the southern star in Libra inspired the formation of the Egyptian calendar, initiated about 1322 B. C., as at that time the first point of Libra, or Thot, of the Egyptian zodiac, was very near to Libra. A little south of Orion's belt is Sirius, the dog star, and the most brilliant of the heavenly bodies.

THE NORTH POLE.

The bright northern star, Polaris, nearly indicates the position of the north pole. It must be remembered that this pole is not fixed. "The eccentric movement of the pole results from the action of the sun, moon and planets on the protuberant matter about the earth's equator, causing the axis of the earth to change its direction and assume a conical motion, like that of a peg-top when it loses its speed." "This toy," says Sir John Herschell, "illustrates the whole phenomenon" of the procession of the equinoxes. The pole has therefore a slow motion, completing a small circle around the pole of the ecliptic in 25,867 years; and may be considered as the second hand of Time on the dial of the Great Clock of Eternity." * * "The pole now approaching Polaris, will be nearest to it in 2120 A. D., after which it will recede from it, and for 250 centuries, Polaris, or as the Arabs named it, Kaukab al Shemal, will cease to be the polar star.

"The earth is always changing the polar star. After 2120 A. D., the pole will, receding from Polaris, pass through Cepheus and Cygnus to Lyra, when in 14,120 A. D., Vega will be the brightest star in the vicinity of the pole. Then passing through Hercules and Draco, the pole will return to Ursa Minor. In the days of the building of the Pyramids, Draconis, Thuban, was the pole star. * * * The diameter of the earth's orbit being 185 millions of miles, it is but a point when seen from the nearest fixed star."

THE FIXED STARS.

The fixed stars, in spite of their apparent fixity, do, however, move. Our own sun, a fixed star to others, traveling with his system of planets, in an enormous orbit, is at present moving towards a point in the constellation of Hercules at a supposed rate of four miles per second. The center around which the sun's orbit lies is supposed to be near the Pleiades.

Nebula, formerly supposed to be composed of a dense cloud of innumerable stars, are now known to be glowing masses of gaseous substance, not moving like comets, but retaining their position like fixed stars. The celestial conclave is strewn with nebula of various sizes, and brilliancy of character.

And all these twenty millions of fixed stars, and doubtless countless millions more, came into existence without planet by chance—did they? They manifest life, evolution, order and purpose, by chance—do they? They are governed by law, or they are not. But law is not creative. It is only a method of action. And to talk of a universe of stars and magnificent worlds, afire with life, being governed by law, without any infinite intelligence or purpose, is to talk the wildest nonsense. It has been said that "the undevout astronomer is mad." Possible, I am mad, but I cannot help agreeing with Alfred R. Wallace, who speaks of the "Supreme Mind of the Universe," with Andrew Jackson Davis, who taught that God was the "Great Positive Mind of the Univercoelum," and with Prof. William Denton, who wisely said, "I could as soon believe that a boulder rolling down a mountain stream could be fashioned into a perfect bust of Daniel Webster, as that natural selection of atoms, or a creative force undirected by mind could transform a gelatinous dot into an intelligent man." Honestly, I have not yet developed up to that assumed "scientific plane" of believing in paintings without painters, poems without poets, books without printers, effects without causes, and a magnificent life-giving and orderly universe without an intelligent Purpose, which Purpose can only be predicated of Infinite Intelligence.

A HOT RECEPTION IN DUNEDIN, N. Z.

A seemingly devout Presbyterian of this New Zealand city, and just possibly a "reincarnation" of John Calvin, unredeemed, recently wrote thus to a member of the "Harbinger of Light" staff in Melbourne. The article was published in the "Harbinger" of April 1, that others might partake of its sweetness and "Christian" sanctity. Here is the lovely gem, verbatim:

* * "So, old Peebles is coming this way! Well, he had better mind his p's and q's, or his reception will not be too pleasant for him. Though a teetotler, he will get a drop of "old Scotch" that won't suit his health, or blend with his 'spirits.' These long-haired men, and women with short-cropped tops are not a success here; nor are they wanted. Their perversion of history and general disregard for facts, their pompous parade of superior knowledge, whilst all the time illiterate and uninformed, have been shown up again and again, until the people have come to heartily distrust the whole pack of them. Presbyterians and truth are too strong for them; so you had better keep your samples within your Commonwealth."

The following letter, manifesting the same orthodox animus as the above, shows the spirit of Calvinistic Presbyterianism in South New Zealand:

"Dunedin, April 11, 1892.

"Mr. Peebles, Sir:—I heard you once when here many years ago delivering your blasphemies against the atonement. You had a Mr. Dunn with you who read schoolboy poems and played spirit trances. Believing your doctrines to be blasphemous, I prayed the Lord Jehovah to save your soul. Yet, here you are again possessed of the evil one, teaching, as the apostle said, 'the doctrines of devils.' We neither wanted your presence then, nor do we want it now with your Spiritualism. It is all of the devil. You had better go away from a city that does not want you. The scriptures say, 'He that believeth not shall be damned,' and the Lord Jesus warned men against sin, and a 'hell-fire that should not be quenched.' Read St. Mark, 9th chapter. Yours, etc.

"A Christian, with the Bible by His Side."

The above letters, bitter, bigoted and, I fear, malicious, would be quite endurable if the writers had had the courage of their convictions, and signed their proper names to their personal lucubrations. But they did not. They dare not. How, from the depths of my soul, do I abominate the hiding, sneaking cowardice of a coward. Never in all my sixty years of public life, did I write letters, pamphlets or books under a fictitious name. I hold that to write, criticise, or misrepresent another under a nom de plume is unworthy, unmanly and absolutely unprincipled, I care not whether it be in the line of ecclesiastics, ethics, or politics.

A DIFFERENT RECEPTION IN DUNEDIN.

On the evening of the 9th of April, the Spiritualists of this city gave me a most delightful reception in their hall, which, though a rather small one, was filled to its utmost capacity by Spiritualists and those who sympathize with the movement. It was a most enjoyable season, consisting of addresses, instrumental music, solos, songs, speeches by different persons, hand-shakings, and closing with a supply of most inviting refreshments. Everybody seemed happy. Mr. Bushby, who is at present lecturing for the Spiritualists in this city, made a brief, but most happy speech. These two different receptions represent the two sides of life's ever-varying shield, shadow and sunshine, pain and pleasure, bigotry and liberality, the devilism of dogmas, and the Spiritualism of divine truth and love. Having had my share of both, I feel quite content. After all said, this is a beautiful world. There is more sunshine than storm, vastly more pleasure than pain, and in all my journeyings around and around the world I have heard a hundred joyous laughs for a single groan, and seen ten thousand smiles for a single tear.

QUARANTINED.

On my way by steamer from Tasmania to Dunedin, we were quarantined at the first port we called at in New Zealand, The Bluff. This steamer, the Warrimoo, had come from Melbourne by way of Hobart, having on board passengers from Sydney, where the plague has been mildly raging; and so we were quarantined and examined to see that we were not plague-stricken. Quite a time was spent in fumigating the ship. It was a snuff of sulphur that I did not enjoy. The doctors make infinitely more of this "plague" than they need to. The same may be said of small-pox. Personally, I should prefer the small-pox to being poisoned with beastly vaccine virus. Both small-pox and this bubonic plague are filth diseases, and the best medical authorities of Australia declare that this plague is no worse, or no more dangerous than the typhoid fever. These quarantines, fumigations, examinations and vaccinations all make work for the doctors, and it is my honest and well-matured opinion that every year they kill far more than they cure.

I lecture here in Dunedin twice week-day evenings, and on Sundays for some three weeks, and then go to Wellington, the capital of New Zealand, where I have one more engagement. I am urged to return to Sydney for a three months' engagement. There is no end to calls, calls, calls for lectures. The people are hungering for spiritual truths, for demonstrations of a future existence, and for a knowledge of what is to transpire when life's mortal curtain falls. Spiritualism is the world's hope.

Before this reaches your readers, I shall be on my way to the U. S. A. by way of London, ready for work. Being a little past eighty, I find that I can lecture two or three week-day evenings, twice on Sunday, write, and psychically heal, more or less, and all with perfect ease.

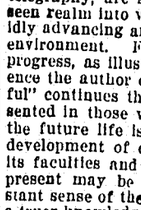
RESTORES EYESIGHT.

"Actina," a Marvelous Discovery that Cures All Afflictions of the Eye Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need for cutting, drugging or probing the eye for any form of disease. There is no risk or experimenting, as thousands of people have been cured of blindness, failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye through this grand discovery, when eminent oculists termed the cases incurable.



Mrs. A. L. Howe, Tully, N.Y., writes: "Actina removed cataracts from both my eyes. I can read well without glasses. Am 65 years old." Robert Baker, 80 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill., writes: "I should have been blind had I not used "Actina." Actina is sent on trial postpaid. If you will send your name and address to the New York & London Electric Association, Dept. T. 929 Walnut Street, Kansas City, Mo., you will receive free, a valuable book, Prof. Wilson's Treatise on the Eye and on Disease in General, and you can rest assured that your eyesight and hearing will be restored, no matter how many doctors have failed.

Weak Eyes

All Imperfections of the Eye, Even Blindness, Cured at Home without Use of Knife or Painful Methods.

No oculist living today has had so extensive a practice in the curing of cataracts, granulated lids, failing eyesight, cross eyes and all imperfections of the eye as the eminent specialist, Dr. F. Geo. Curts, of Kansas City, Mo. His cures are perfected at your own home through his Mild Medicine Method, without knife or Pain. Any reader afflicted with eye trouble, or have a friend afflicted, write today and receive absolutely free, Dr. Curts' wonderful book "Treatise On The Eye." It tells you how his many wonderful cures are made. Address

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

THAT SCHOOL OF OURS.

Some Pertinent Remarks by Clara L. Stewart.

So much has been written about the Whitewater School that is calculated to give a wrong impression, it seems time for me to speak on the subject.

In last week's issue of The Progressive Thinker, Mrs. Clara Watson resumes her controversy with Moses Hull, and the basis of her remarks seems to be the school which she is pleased to call the "Moses Hull School."

I feel that I am in a better position to know the true conditions attendant upon the starting or founding this school, which in time will be a college, than any other person, and I believe others should know them.

Last September Moses Hull was speaking in Wisconsin, having been engaged during the convention to give one month to missionary work in the state. I arranged for several meetings in Whitewater, to be held in what was known as Pratt's Temple, and assisted Mr. Hull in those meetings. One day while talking with Mr. Hull he said:

"What a grand building this would be as a starter for a college." The remark impressed me forcibly, and I soon found a chance to repeat it to Mr. Pratt. He answered:

"Well, it can be had providing the Spiritualists will take hold of it and carry it on."

I at once called Mr. Hull from his room, and after a short talk Mr. Pratt and his wife drew up a proposition to the N. S. A., and requested Mr. Hull and myself to present it in October at the National Convention, which we did, but as there was a condition in the proposition that imposed a pledge from them of ten thousand dollars as an endowment fund, the executive board of the N. S. A. did not feel that they could bind themselves to accept the proposition, especially as the convention made no provisions for the fund. Consequently at a meeting of the board held the evening following the convention, at which I was present, they commissioned me to go to Whitewater and make the best terms I could with Mr. Pratt to secure the property for the purpose designated. I came to Whitewater and reported the action of the convention and executive board.

Naturally Mr. Pratt felt the apparent lack of interest on the part of Spiritualists, and said he would not give the building to the N. S. A. unless it complied with the conditions named.

I then proposed to Mr. Pratt that he deed the property to a board of trustees in trust for the Spiritualists at large, but refused to consider it in behalf of the Wisconsin State Association, thinking it best to have it under the control of no association unless the National. This proposition pleased Mr. Pratt provided the trustees agreed to appoint or elect Moses Hull as president, and to conduct the college along the lines of Spiritualism as laid down and taught by the National Spiritualist Association, and to affiliate in every way and at all times with that body, making the president of the N. S. A. and of the W. S. A. ex-officio directors; but in no other sense whatever is the school sectional or under the control or directorship of any individual or body corporate. As to its being a Moses Hull school, I will add that Moses Hull is making the sacrifice of his life in taking the position and responsibility he has accepted in this college.

When Mr. Pratt decided to deed the property to Spiritualists in this manner, I telegraphed Mr. Hull to come to Whitewater, as it was important for him to be there. He came and at the urgent reugest of Mr. Pratt and the trustees named, he consented to take the office, but said he would work as faithfully in any other capacity if we would appoint another president.

I would say to our good Sister Watson and any others who may feel that this is "Moses Hull's School," that it belongs as much to them as to Mr. Hull, and it is as much the property of the other trustees as it is his; but as it is the property of Spiritualists in general, if they will support it, it belongs no more to one than another farther than that they have a greater interest in it as they labor for its success; but it will not belong to any one long if those who should support it persist in trying to kill it at birth, unless Moses Hull and those who have its future good at heart can save it from its enemies.

I have been told several times since coming to Whitewater, that if it can be redeemed from the stigma of Atheism that has threatened it, the citizens will gladly support it; and that brings me to a point in Mrs. Watson's article. She says in substance, she supposed it was the mission or duty of Spiritualism to "expose the mistakes of the churches."

It seems to me we have been working on that principle so long, that now the churches have fallen in line with us, we must still oppose some one or thing, or if there is no one outside our ranks, we will attack our own. I was grieved to-day when our good old Brother Pratt, who has done so much for us, remarked after reading Sister Watson's article, "I wish our people could be educated to not make such open tirades on each other. What is the matter with us that we cannot brook the difference of opinions?"

It seems to me all this is unnecessary. The aim of the school is to be an institution of general education, and surely there is need of all the schools we have. In Wisconsin at least all are running over.

Then it is argued, let our people go to the public schools. It does not seem to be taken into consideration that many men and women come into this work after the years that debar them from the public schools; and again many would not like to take their places with the children in the lower grades who would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity in a school of this kind, if such existed. They are faithful, capable workers, and with a little assistance by way of schooling are able to carry their messages of love and peace into homes and localities they otherwise could not reach. We are in the world as it is, not as we might wish it to be. It is an age of intellectual advancement. If we keep pace with it we must develop intellect, and while we claim to be the most advanced people, we have little to fasten that claim upon. We have been going on in a haphazard, go-as-you-please manner—no schools, no rules, no homes, no organization and no legislation, until nine years ago a few brave souls banded together and formed the National Association. Of course it was beginning at the top to build the house, but the house would not have been built otherwise. It has been a struggle for them ever since, but they have won. Through their efforts we have now legal recognition, and as we are living in a world where politics control, it is quite essential we have some voice in political issues.

The N. S. A. has done many good things; among others given us a Declaration of Principles, by some called "creed." It was not my idea of a Declaration of Principles, but I had rather have that than none. It is providing a home for the needy, and I believe will yet mother the first Spiritualist College, yet it must meet the censure of many who will not make the efforts the noble officers of that body are making. It is the same with Moses Hull. He will sacrifice the remainder of his days for the good of this school, as he has given his past years for Spiritualism, while his wife will forego the comforts of a quiet life to assist in the duties of the school. I am not defending Mr. Hull, for the reason I do not think he needs it, and if he did there are others more capable who would gladly take up their pens for that purpose. I do not consider him infallible. I have found him human, I am glad to say; one who can be mistaken and knows how to make allowance for others who do likewise, but he is also too noble to criticize the mistakes of others when not forced to do so, but with no purpose in mind other than the good of the school. I say with Mr. Hull as the president of the college that belongs to Spiritualists, if they will support the efforts the officers are making to bring it before the world it will be a credit to our cause and a blessing to humanity.

There will be no theology taught that will dwarf the mind; no prayers that will callous the sense of self-responsibility, and our Revs. will compare favorably with radicals of all classes and schools. Again, mediums will not be made, but where mediumship exists every advantage will be given for its development with the best possible surroundings.

There will be held in the Institute, June 24 and 25, the first convention of the school association, and it is hoped there will be a good attendance from all parts of the country. Come and see the building and meet the directors. Listen to the eloquent addresses by our most worthy President, Moses Hull, and Superintendent, A. J. Weaver, and assist us in getting started.

Where ten or more buy tickets from the same station they can get excursion rates, one and one-third fare, provided they all come and return at the same time. Yours for the good of the school,

CLARA L. STEWART.

A VICTORY.

Medical Persecution Frustrated.

That much can be done through the columns of the newspaper was never better illustrated than during the past few months by the numerous correspondence received by myself, brought out by reason of letters which I had sent to The Progressive Thinker. The seeds sown in its columns have been productive of much good and will continue to spread the glad tidings so long as its teachings continue to be scattered among the people.

The believers in psychic phenomena have, during the past year, been much harassed and tormented, and ill treated, not to say abused, and almost nailed to the cross of bitter persecution by disbelievers, more especially the Medicos of the Puget Sound Basin. We are here situated in the farthermost northwest corner of the great American Republic, bounded in on one side by the breakers of the broad Pacific, and on the other the snow-capped peaks of the Cascade Mountains, where one would naturally think the poisonous breath of sectarianism would find scant foothold, yet their fangs have entered, and the canker and fester of their venomous breath have been allowed to permeate this pure air.

The readers of The Progressive Thinker will remember the bitter war which was waged by the medical fraternity against the spiritual healers as well as others, not belonging to their faith; of the passage of a bill by the last Legislature for the express purpose of persecution; of the veto of Governor John R. Rogers, who since my last communication has passed to the spirit world, and whose mind was too broad and comprehensive while here among us to be understood by the pigmies who passed it over his veto; of the arrest of myself and others of like faith by and through the instigation of the Medical Association of Whatcom county, in an attempt to enforce its provisions.

The sequel to this infamous persecution has been at last written in letters so broad and deep that he who runs may read, and the vindication of our dead Governor in his efforts to perform an act of justice to the people, has been complete.

As I have heretofore stated, we were arrested at the instigation of the Whatcom County Medical Society, and placed under bonds, and for what? Simply that the parasites might fatten upon the credulity of those who were so unfortunate as to become ill, and in order that the legal fraternity might profit from their perfidy.

Three terms of the Superior Court have passed into the great beyond since these arrests have been made. I have made numerous efforts to have the cases brought to trial, but without avail; I have squandered many dollars upon legal advice with like result, and now at this late day there comes an opinion from the State's Attorney General like a thunderbolt from a cloudless sky, knocking the prop from under all the hopes of the narrow-minded outfit, and declaring the act inoperative and of no avail. The County Attorney immediately upon recept of this opinion released all prisoners and dismissed all cases, but as yet none of us has been returned the cash we were compelled to outlay in order to protect ourselves in our just rights.

This, of course, ends the matter for the present. The Legislature will again convene next January, and without doubt this bill will again be brought up in another form, and the persecution continued, if the Medical Society of the State can wield sufficient power.

ASPIRATION.

'Tis dawn, and inspiration
Bids mist and clouds depart,
And light from spirit sources
Now warms and cheers my heart.

Below, among the shadows,
The world still sleeping lies;
Beyond, the beaming hill-tops
Attract my longing eyes.

I haste along the upward way
By law divine impelled,
I climb the rocky pathway,
By love divine upheld.

I toil among the foot-hills
Of Alpine heights beyond,
And eagerly press forward
For I am homeward bound.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt may be addressed for camp or society engagements, at 498 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill., or at The Progressive Thinker office.

Harry J. Moore who has proved a great favorite at Rochester, Ind., as a lecturer, will respond to calls to attend camp-meetings. Address him at No. 773 Sixty-third Place, Englewood Station, Chicago, Ill.

The Hobart (New Zealand) Mercury has the following in reference to the pilgrim, Dr. J. M. Peebles: "Dr. J. M. Peebles, M. A., M. D., of America, who is traveling to New Zealand, delivered a lecture at the Masonic Hall on Thursday evening on 'Spiritualism.' There was a very large attendance, and Mr. H. H. Gill presided. Dr. Peebles, after a brief introduction, explained that we were surrounded by the spiritual world, but the selfishness of mankind prevented its signs being seen. He grieved for such blindness. It was acknowledged that in by-gone ages miracles had taken place, and why ought not such things to occur again? God had not changed, and he maintained that the same marvels did still take place. Those who were supposed to be dead were still spiritually around us, leading men into the ways of truth and love. Dr. Peebles related a number of spiritual communications and marvels that had occurred within his own experience, and said that a thorough knowledge of the subject of Spiritualism removed all fear of death. He exhorted his hearers to lead the best of lives, because the spiritual life commenced on the same plane as the earthly one ended. Dr. Peebles expressed a hope that he would be able to deliver another lecture at Hobart on some future occasion."

Mrs. G. S. Davis writes: "Words cannot express my appreciation for the books you present to your subscribers every year, for they certainly are a gift, and one that all good Spiritualists should possess. They are grand books, and will bear reading many times. I look for my Progressive Thinker every Wednesday morning as I would for an old friend. I do not feel that I can get through the week without it."

Arrangements for the annual camp-meeting of the Mississippi Valley Spiritualist Association have been completed and the session will open July 27 and close August 24. The association has a membership of many thousands, one of the largest societies of its kind on this continent. It owns Pleasant Park, a beautiful tract of land on the bluffs just to the west of the city of Clinton, Iowa, overlooking the Mississippi River. Here a mammoth pavilion and amphitheater have been erected, besides numerous cottages, where many people from a distance reside during the hot months and attend the daily sessions. The president is W. F. Peck, of St. Louis. The following noted lecturers and mediums will be present: W. F. Peck, St. Louis; H. D. Barrett, president of the National Spiritualists' Association and editor of the Banner of Light; Miss Lizzie Harlow, of Hadensville, Mass.; Jennie Hagen-Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Kates, Mrs. Georgia Cooley, J. H. Altemus, of Washington, D. C., and others.—Des Moines News.

M. Dorothy Daily, inspirational speaker, of Detroit, Mich., will visit Northeastern Texas during the month of June.

Since Francesco Brogna was stabbed to death by his friend Domenico Olliviero, on April 8, uncanny noises and ghostly manifestations are said to be of nightly occurrence in the Italian boarding-house run by Mrs. Michael Avello, at No. 515 Spring street, West Hoboken. Last Sunday night such strange things happened in the house that none of the boarders could sleep, and yesterday they packed up and went elsewhere. Boys later bombarded the house with stones, breaking windows and doing other damage that the owner says amounts to more than $700.—Brooklyn (N. Y.) Citizen.

In response to inquiries as to a confusion of names we are authorized to state that the lady known in the lecture field as Mrs. Steelman Mitchell, was married to Dr. William T. Nichols, of Chicago, January 31, 1900, by Justice J. C. Murphy, of Chicago. Both the Doctor and Mrs. Nichols are engaged in spiritual work.

Mrs. E. J. Demorest, inspirational speaker and platform test medium, can be addressed for engagements at 300 Bissel street, Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Fred L. H. Willis, the veteran worker, writes from Rochester, N. Y.: "I have since the 8th of February been passing through a terrible siege of suffering. I was knocked down by a runaway horse attached to an overturned sleigh and taken up for dead. I received a fearful injury. My spine was very seriously injured, and I was bruised and sprained and cut badly. My escape from instant death was a miracle. I am only just able to get about with any degree of comfort or ease. It's pretty evident they don't want me on the other side, for I have been through with enough to kill ten men during the past seven years, if there were any kill to them."

Dr. R. McL. Angus is open for engagements for camps or societies; lecturer and message medium. Good morals and reference. Terms reasonable. Address 405 West Jefferson street, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Dr. Rush writes from Santa Barbara, Cal.: "The people of Santa Barbara and Summerland, Cal., have for the past two months had the pleasure of having Mrs. E. E. Hammon, now of Los Angeles, Cal., but recently and for fifteen years of Topeka, Kan., as their minister from the spiritual platform. The Spiritual societies of both places were well pleased with her ministrations."

"Dick," the Deal House parrot, of Bucyrus, Ohio, that was sold to a New York man for $200, has a record for breaking up a ministerial conference which was held in the hotel parlors and had become a weekly affair. Dick was at attentive listener for several weeks, and then decided to get into the game himself. A minister opened the meeting with prayer, and, suddenly during a pause in the petition, Dick broke in with "O Lord, vouchsafe to us thy presence this afternoon." The minister was disconcerted, and there was a snicker among the assembly. The minister began again, but Dick, warming to his work, piped in with "Give us seeing eyes, hearing ears and understanding hearts." The snicker deepened into laughter, and the minister stopped, while Dick went calmly on with "Shed upon us the light of thy countenance and grant us thy grace." The ministers shouted with laughter, but when they again came to order and a clergyman rose to speak, Dick said in a tone of deep disgust, "Oh, shut up." Somebody rose and, taking the cage from the hall, set it down with a thump. Before the door closed they heard the bird apostrophizing himself mournfully, "Now, Dick, will you be good?" This was too much, and the meeting broke up amidst great hilarity.

Mrs. M. A. Logue writes from Butte City, Mont.: "My society, the Progressive Spiritualist, honored me on my 64th birthday, 7th of May, with a surprise party. Forty people were present, making me many presents."

Mrs. J. Lindsey writes from Grant, Mich.: "I am at this place trying to plant the truths of spirit knowledge, showing that if a man die he shall live again. I expect to be in Chicago sometime in June. I will go to Iowa and attend the camps, and do all I can to help promote the grand philosophy of spirit return. I shall return home this week. I am now ready to fill engagements with societies. My terms are in reach of all who need my services. Address me at No. 162 Scribner street, Grand Rapids, Mich."

C. H. Mathews writes: "Bishop Burgess, of the Episcopal diocese of Long Island, has sent out notice that the presence of women in the surpliced choirs of the diocese is distasteful to him, and he has ordered that the women singers in the nine missions attached to the Cathedral of the Incarnation, over which he has direct jurisdiction, be retired as soon as possible. (Associated Press, May 16, 1902.) The good bishop is only following out the edicts of St. Paul: 'Let the women keep science in the churches; and if they wish to learn, let them ask their husbands at home.' Of course this man of God is popular among the women."

A writer in the Evangelist has been considering the future state, not simply with regard to the possibilities it may present for everlasting glory, but also with regard to the developments it may have for those who merit punishment. Hell has gone out of fashion, except in some of the most rural districts. The college professors who get into trouble and the newspapers almost invariably confine themselves either to the origin of man or to his chance of going to heaven. Few of them give hell a second thought.—Record-Herald.

J. M. Kennedy writes from Marysville, Ohio: "On the evening of the 20th of May I attended the seance of Mrs. Mary McCoy and Mr. H. E. Chase, at 196 East Gay street, Columbus, Ohio, Mrs. McCoy, the medium. More than twenty forms came and all recognized. My spirit wife, Millie C. Kennedy, who by the way was a fine medium in earth life, came to me. I was sitting in the extreme back of the circle. She took my hands and said to me, 'Let us go back.' She pushed me back to a large bay window which was all open and the moon shining in, and she sat down on a chair, and I sat down by her and held her hands and we carried on a conversation for five minutes, just as she would if in the physical body. She dematerialized while on the way to the cabinet. A body, Mrs. White's husband, came out and sat by her side for several minutes."

"Prof. Hart, clairvoyant, who has been holding forth at No. 21 Mechanic street, was ordered out of town this morning by Chief of Police Murray. There is a state law against professional fortune-telling and the authorities are determined to break up the practice in this city. Prof. Hart made no resistance and left the city at once." O. J. Johnson writes from Bradford, Pa.: "The enclosed clipping was taken out of the Bradford Star on the 17th inst. This Prof. Hart is the notorious Jules Wallace. I met him on the street, and recognized him at once, and called him by the name. I used to know him when I met him in Chicago, but he said, of course, his name was not Wallace. He plied his humbuggery here for a couple of weeks. Finally one of the leading Spiritualists went to the Chief of Police and reported this Professor Hart and his doings, and from the clipping you will see that the said professor left on invitation. E. Cordeu White is doing a good work here, and is held in esteem by all classes of people in and out of the churches, as well as Spiritualists. Another good medium is also located here, a Mrs. A. M. Brown, who has the confidence of those that patronize her for readings. Brother White occupies the Universalist church here every Wednesday evening for giving messages from the spirit world and the church is generally filled every evening. I find that in this city there is a great many Spiritualists and liberal thinkers, but no organization. It seems to me that here is a good field for the organizers of societies."

Marguerite St. Omer Briggs, of Detroit, met with a good reception in Bay city, and served them on the 4th, 11th and 18th to large and appreciative audiences. She cannot speak too highly of the Ladies' Aid (to a defunct society) for their endeavors to hold together, and by socials, circles, etc., to raise money to occasionally hold public meetings. She regretted her inability to remain longer with them, but would return in the near future if possible. She was invited to speak on the 25th in Saginaw, but was hastily called home. She has open dates for the month of June, and for camp-meetings, July and August.

A. D. Jacoby says that D. A. Murrel and wife, of Grand Rapids, gave several very good trumpet seances at Muskegon, Mich.

Lyman C. Howe writes from Fredonia, N. Y.: "I spoke at Niagara Falls last Sunday evening and go again for the 25th; then to Freeville, N. Y., June 1; Lily Dale, the 15th; Bankson Lake, Mich., 26 to 29; Chesterfield Camp, July 20 to 25."

The leading Spiritualists of Spokane, Wash., realizing the desirability and necessity of supporting the pure spiritual work which has been done in the interests of humanity by Mrs. A. C. Priest, have reorganized the First Society of Spokane for the purpose of sustaining her in her beautiful work. At the attractive, commodious, and easily available public reading room, 226 North Post street, every Sunday evening, the philosophy is presented by A. C. Priest and the higher phases of the phenomena by Mrs. A. C. Priest. It is regarded by travelers as the prettiest and best appointed room in the country.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley writes from Houston, Tex.: "I am here for a week and find the people just lovely, and for some reason—I know not why—they seemed to have fallen in love with this one from the wild and woolly Northwest."

Mrs. L. C. LeSieur writes: "The Band of Harmony will give a progressive euchre party, the fifth Thursday of this month, (May 29), at their rooms, 608 Handel Hall Building. There will be six prizes awarded. Ice cream and cake will be served. Admission 25 cents, including score cards and refreshments."

Mary M. Williams writes from Colton, Cal.: "Mr. J. L. Dryden is now serving the little spiritual society of San Bernardino, and is a man of such a character and ability enough to insure him constant calls and a wider reputation.

B. writes from Lily Dale, N. Y.: "May at Lily Dale is a beautiful dream. Pen cannot picture the loveliness of this enchanting spot at the present writing; beauty everywhere; the trees just putting on their summer robes of green, are literally filled with birds, and sweetest music fills the air. The work of clearing up and renovating the camp ground is being pushed with vigor. The Hotel Grand will be thoroughly renovated and put in first class order; sewerage attended to, and all needed care will be taken by the management of the camp to have everything in the best order possible for the coming season. At this early date, the cottages are rapidly being taken; and it is said there never before was so great a call for rooms as now. The program for 1902 is a strong one, and the prospect is that this season will excel all in the past in point of interest."

The Illinois state medical convention has recommended the passage of a new general practice act by the next General Assembly. The proposed bill provides for a board of seven medical examiners, to be appointed by the Governor upon recommendation of the incorporated medical societies of the state. This board shall issue licenses to practitioners upon their passing an examination in the various branches to be practiced by them. The bill recognizes such branches as osteopathy, hypnotism, and other systems in which no medicines are used, but insists upon an examination of each practitioner according to a formula provided by the board itself. The board shall serve for seven years, except that the terms of the first board shall be so arranged that only one new member shall be appointed each year hereafter. Those who receive licenses to practice shall record them in the county in which they reside, and licenses may be revoked for unprofessional conduct at any time.

Mrs. A. Johnson writes: "Rev. Nellie S. Baade, pastor of the First Spiritual Philosophical Society, of Detroit, Mich., made a flying visit to Pittsburg and Allegheny, Pa., on the 14th of May. She gave two fine addresses, one in Hancock street hall, and one on Thursday afternoon in Pittsburg at the First Spiritual church. She is engaged for the Spiritual Society in Wheeling for the Month of May and June."

Salem, N. J.—With the following words, the Rev. M. J. Hann, of Centreville, this county, took leave of his congregation on Tuesday: "Brothers and sisters, I come to say good-bye. I don't think God loves this church, because none of you ever die. I don't think you love each other, because you have not paid my salary. Your donations are mouldy fruit and wormy apples, and by their fruits ye shall know them. Brothers, I am going to a better place. I have been called to be chaplain of a penitentiary. I go to prepare a place for you, and may the Lord have mercy on your souls. Good-bye."—Philadelphia North American.

A reader writes: "Mrs. Hattie Smith, president of the Unity Spiritual Society, of Milwaukee, Wis., left last night for the East, to join her husband, who is temporarily engaged in Rochester, N. Y.; and Miss Grace E. Smith, who presides over our music, is also taking a well-earned vacation, visiting friends and relatives in Chicago. We pray that both may soon return to take up their active work with the society again. Mr. Max Hoffmann, who has been very successful in his work during the months of April and May, has been engaged by the society to continue during the month of June. We hold now one regular Sunday meeting at the Ethical Building, and two socials at the homes of our members during the week. All are well attended, and interest in Spiritualism is growing in Milwaukee."

The Oak Park Journal, of Oak Park, Cal., has the following in reference to Prof. Gee: "Regarding the prophecies which the Professor has made and which were fulfilled to the letter, it is best to give them in his own words: "On the 6th day of November, 1899, I was invited by Mrs. C. A. Stanley, who lives at Clipper Gap, seven miles above Auburn, to come there for a few weeks' recreation, and I did so. At the appointed time of my arrival I was met by Mrs. Stanley. On the way to her home she introduced me to a young man who kept a box factory, who manufactured boxes for packing fruit. While I held his hand my guiding spirit told me to inform him that on the Saturday following he should keep away from the machine he worked or he would have the two front fingers of his right hand cut off at the second joint. He promised to obey, but for some reason he neglected to do so, and at the hour on the day mentioned my prediction came true. The young man lost his fingers. On the day of the accident the spirit guide again spoke through me—this time to Mrs. Stanley. I requested her to send word to the foreman of the powder mill that unless he removed his mixer on the 6th day of November six tons of powder would ignite, through the carelessness of the mixer, and as a result one Mr. Hamilton and two other men would be killed outright, and several others injured. Mrs. Stanley conveyed the message to the manager of the mill, but he sent back word that I could mind my own business, and, incidentally, go to a warmer climate. Several men working in the mill, who knew of the other prediction, remained away, but the others met their fate, for on the 6th day of November the explosion occurred. All that remained of Hamilton that could be identified was a finger, which was found hanging to a limb of a tree. I further predicted that the mill would be rebuilt, but in two years would again blow up and kill a young man from the East. Anyone who cares to take the pains of looking over the files of the Examiner, Call, Chronicle, or any daily paper published at that time can verify the truthfulness of these prophecies." Professor Gee has made many other marvelous predictions, which can at this time only be briefly mentioned. He foretold Cleveland's second election, and only a few days before the campaign of 1892 ended, the Professor, who was then in San Bernardino, predicted that the Stewart Hotel at that place would burn to the ground and that the walls would have to be propped up to keep them from falling into the street. At the very hour mentioned the catastrophe occurred."

Dr. John Hamlin Dewey, the prominent metaphysical author, writes in Christian as follows: "Some of us have demonstrated in actual experience that there is no death to the human soul, and that all who have passed out of the body are still living in full possession of all the faculties, powers and characteristics which constituted their personal life while in the body, save their sense relations with the outward world through the body; and that they hold the same vital relations to us on the soul side of our being as when in the body, and can communicate with us through the telepathic law as perfectly as if they were in the body, when we co-operate with them to this end. Granting, however, for the time being, the truth of our claim, that the inner spiritual world, the home of earth's departed, is as close and vitally related to this world as are our souls to our bodies, and that vital communication between them is as normal and legitimate as between soul and body while together, and that souls in the body can, under proper conditions, have telepathic communication with the departed, high or low, and vice versa, then we have a rational basis for the experience and demonstration I am suggesting."

Emma M. Nutt Moore writes: "For the first two Sundays of May I spoke for the Spiritualists of Port Huron. The hall has a seating capacity of several hundred. In the morning a fair sized audience greeted me; in the evening the hall was full. From Port Huron I came to Kalamazoo, and last evening I gave my first lecture here. The hall presented a beautiful appearance, the rostrum being decorated with palms and very beautiful cut flowers, which with the pleasant conditions given me, made the evening's work a success. I shall be here some time yet, and then leave for my home in Elwood. My husband and self go to Island Lake Camp for the season. I shall be pleased to hear from societies wishing a speaker and medium for the fall and winter months. Terms reasonable. Address me at 324½ South Anderson street, Elwood, Ind."

Mrs. Elisabeth Holmes and husband, Dr. F. C. Holmes, of Minneapolis, are now in West Superior, Wis., were they intend to stay until fall, when they return to Minneapolis. They are conducting Spiritualist services Sunday evenings at the Odd Fellows Temple, and have so far been very successful in getting the people interested. They have held three meetings; at the last one there were not seats enough. There is need of workers in Duluth, our neighboring city, but there is a very peculiar city ordinance in force there forbidding every kind of spirit manifestation. The goody, goody Spiritualists over there, in trying to weed out the tares, having succeeded in destroying the whole field, and have so left Duluth to materialism and Romanism. It is impossible for them to work there, regardless of the credentials which Mrs. Holmes holds from the State Association of Minnesota.

Will J. Erwood, secretary, writes: The arrangements for the camp at Waukesha, Wis., are progressing rapidly and from the present outlook everything points to one of the most successful and enjoyable camps of the season. The camp grounds are located in the near vicinity of Waukesha, which in itself is sufficient guarantee of the desirability of the location. Waukesha, as all know, is a summer resort of note. The management of the camp will endeavor to place on its platform talent of the highest order, not only as far as ability and psychic power is concerned, but also individual character. Already the following talent has been secured: Rev. Moses Hull, Harrison D. Barrett, Mrs. Mattie Hull, and Mrs. Catherine McFarlin. The management is in correspondence with other workers who will be brought to the camp, and whose presence will add greatly to the success of the meetings. The accommodations will all be of the first order, and visitors may be assured of a delightful time at a reasonable expenditure. The programs will be out early, and will give in detail all the advantages of the camp. Tents will be supplied at reasonable rates, and intending visitors would do well to write the secretary of the State Association regarding the same. In order to secure tents, etc., it would be advisable to apply early. The camp is under the auspices of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, and will be in session during the entire month of August. Special attention will be given to that most necessary part of our work, the Lyceum. This will make the camp ground a most desirable place for the young. Make your plans, and bring the little ones that they may have an outing and rational spiritual training at one and the same time. For any desired information, address me at No. 1334 Pine street, LaCrosse, Wis."

Mrs. Kate Hoskins writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "I have been a reader and subscriber for your paper ever since the first year of its publication. I have been a medium and a Spiritualist since the year 1851. I have taken Spiritual papers during all the long years from then until now. While all contain much that is good, I can truthfully say that your paper has given me more real satisfaction than any other. I have come to feel that I cannot do without it. I had rather do without one or even two meals a day than to do without The Progressive Thinker. Our mediums are still being crowded to the wall. Two of the old workers have cases in court. Mrs. Chesbro's has lingered since the 7th of January; no decision yet. We fear it may have to be taken up to the Supreme Court. Of course we do not know until the verdict is rendered. Dr. Richmond was arrested for magnetic healing; had his trial, lost his case and was fined $100. He has carried his case up to the Superior Court. It has come to this that no medium can work in any phase of mediumship in our city without being in danger of arrest. The time has come for mediums and Spiritualists to unite and with the help of our spirit friends break these conditions and show the authorities that we have rights that they will have to recognize and respect."

G. R. Bicknell and five others unite in sending the following: "Decatur, Ill., has been especially favored for the past three weeks in spiritual phenomena through the mediumship of Mrs. Maggie Vestel, of Chesterfield, Ind., she being the guest of Mr. H. Tay, of 439 East Centre street, during her stay. Trumpet circles have been formed for the benefit of those hungering for truth, and the developments and manifestations have been unusually fine, especially the large number of independent voices being heard. Her guides and controls are quite strong, even overcoming artificial light conditions; short sentences having been distinctly heard in a well lighted room. Also a public Sunday night meeting was called under the direction and leadership of Mrs. India Hill, inspirational speaker, and during this meeting rostrum manifestations were given with the trumpet in the brilliant gaslight. Friday night, May 16, the first attempt to record voices on a wax phonograph cylinder was made and the services of Mr. O. Reynolds, expert phonographist, was secured and records of spirit voices were successfully made and reproduced in well defined tones."

Henry B. Allen, the medium, writes from Etna, Wash.: "I am still in the harness working for the cause of Spiritualism. After leaving Chicago three years ago I came to the Pacific Coast, and for the past year have been living here. I have bought a little ranch which I am working upon, and have done what I could to prove to the people our grand truth. When we first came here there were about half a dozen Spiritualists; to-day we have a society of over forty members, and next Sunday we expect to organize a children's lyceum with fifty or more children; so you see Spiritualism is gaining in this community. The president of our society, A. P. Omrys, is the business man of the community, and is one of the best healers I ever met, and also a fine trance medium, and is doing a grand work. He gives free public circles every Sunday night to large and appreciative audiences. I have held circles in many places in this state, and wherever I go I find the people hungry for spiritual food. I also find The Progressive Thinker in nearly all Spiritualist families, and every one says it is the best paper out. We need in this State some more good honest fellows and speakers, and such will receive a hearty welcome in nearly every town in this State. We expect a large attendance at our camp."

Dr. W. M. Forster writes from Raton, New Mexico: "I was injured on the Berkley train, near San Francisco, Cal., last September, and as soon as I was able to move about on crutches I left San Francisco for an extended trip through Mexico and Central America. In spite of the difficulties I experienced in traveling, I managed to cover the itinerary very well, having visited Mexico, Guatemala, San Salvador, Spanish Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, crossing over the latter republic from the Pacific to the Atlantic by easy stages and from thence up the caribean Sea and Gulf of Mexico to New Orleans. After seeing the sights of the Crescent City I have journeyed by slow degrees to Northern New Mexico and shall remain in Raton for some time until my injured limb (which is improving nicely) becomes stronger; then I will head for the City of the Golden Gate, San Francisco. I would be very glad to hear from old friends at this address for a time, care of P. O. Box 76."

W. H. Harrington writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "Mrs. M. N. Hardey, with her daugther, Miss Marguerite Ware, came from Texas to Minnesota in the fall of 1900. They were young in experience as mediums and had no engagement or assurance of business from any source. They were without means and have never relied on advertising. To-day their time is entirely occupied by those seeking, at private sitting or public seance, light or comfort. They have grown constantly in mediumistic powers and in the confidence of people also. Their course is straightforward and honorable. They give away their services to those who wish or need such consideration as freely as the sun shines. They are unselfish in sentiment. Only the kindest and most encouraging word and service are bestowed by them upon other mediums. Their friends are glad, therefore, to see them reach their present position of success and usefulness. Their phases of mediumship are manifold. Independent voices, tablet and slate-writing, materialization, emblematic lights, musical instruments played, etc. Each week the manifestations are of a higher order, showing that they are progressing. They have held seances at my house under conditions furnished by my wife and myself. We hope they will remain in Minneapolis.

Harry J. Moore has been engaged to lecture at the Marshalltown (Iowa) Camp. He has lately been at Alexandria, Ind., to officiate at a funeral.

Mrs. C. McFarlin writes: "Dr. and Mrs. Allen Wheeler, of Milwaukee, celebrated their golden wedding, May 8th, afternoon and evening. The Doctor and Mrs. Wheeler are old and staunch Spiritualists, standing in the front ranks of the intelligent and cultivated Spiritualists of this city. The Doctor has been a Spiritualist for 52 years, and in his special line of practice recognizes the aid of the unseen co-operating with him in the hard and well-earned intelligence he possesses in his profession. Their pretty home was beautifully decorated for the occasion in smilax and cut roses. Though their cards read, no gifts, their friends did not heed, and gave them many little tokens of remembrance; among the most elaborate was an elegant brooch to Mrs. Wheeler and a gold-headed cane for the Doctor. Mrs. Wheeler is not a professional medium, but in a modest and unpretentious way gave a beautiful and consoling message of comfort to the sorrowing."

Dr. A. A. Kimball, of Bangor, Maine, sends for our premium books, and writes: "You are doing a grand work, brother, in furnishing the people with such good books."

Dr. D. Winegarden, inspirational speaker, will answer calls within a radius of fifty miles of Beaumont, Texas. Address for the next two months Beaumont, Texas, Box 302.

Personal Magnetism

How Prominent Men Develop This Power and Use it to Influence Others — Women, Too, Adepts in This Mysterious Art.

A Reporter Makes Astounding Discoveries—Secret Methods Which Charm and Fascinate the Human Mind.

High Priests of the Occult Reveal Jealously Guarded Secrets of Years—A Wonderful New Book by Prominent New York Man.

A wonderful new book entitled "The Secret of Power" has just been issued at an expense of over $5,000 by one of the leading colleges of the City of New York. This book is from the pen of the ablest specialists of modern times. The authors gave away the copyright on conditions that 10,000 copies should be distributed to the public free of charge. The Columbia Scientific Academy is now complying with this contract, and until the edition of 10,000 copies is exhausted you can get a copy of this book absolutely free. The book is profusely illustrated with the most expensive half-tone engravings. It is full of wonderful secrets and startling surprises, and thoroughly explains the real source of the power of personal influence. It fully and completely reveals the fundamental principles of success and influence in every walk of life. The hidden mysteries of personal magnetism will power and scientific character reading are explained in an intensely interesting manner. Two secret methods of personal influence are described, which positively enable any intelligent person to exercise a marvelous influence and control over anyone whom he may wish. These methods are entirely new and have never before been made public. A reporter has tried them personally and can vouch for their wonderful power.

The book also describes absolutely certain methods by which you can read the character, secrets and lives of every one you meet. No one can deceive you. You can tell what vocation is best for you to follow. You can know the secret power by which minds of human beings are charmed and fascinated. The newest, latest and best system of physical and mental culture and magnetic healing is fully explained and illustrated by beautiful half-tone engravings. No such book has ever before been published. No such wonderful information has ever before been placed in the hands of the public. On account of the mighty power and influence placed in one's hands by this book, the legislature of the State of New York debated whether or not the state ought to permit its promiscuous circulation; but it was finally decided the good it would accomplish would greatly overcome the ill, and its distribution was not interfered with.

Not long ago John D. Rockefeller, the richest man in America, said, in talking to a Sunday school class, that he regarded his success in life largely to his ability to influence others. Lincoln, Lee, Napoleon and Alexander the Great, all won name and renown by their wonderful power of personal influence. Jay Gould piled up millions by this same power. J. P. Morgan organized the billion dollar steel trust and enriched himself by millions simply by his marvelous ability to influence others. There are to-day thousands of men with the brains and education of Mr. Morgan who are practically paupers. They have the ability to organize a trust, but they have not sufficient power of personal influence. Personal influence, will-power stamina—call it what you will—has from the creation of man been the subtle force that has brought wealth, fame and renown to those who were fortunate enough to possess it.

This strange, mysterious influence is inherent in every human being. By the late methods explained by the New York specialist in human culture any intelligent person can develop a wonderfully magnetic personality, and learn how to read the character, secrets and the lives of others in a few days' study at his own home. You can use this marvelous power without the knowledge of your most intimate friends and associates. You can use it to obtain lucrative employment, to secure an advance in salary, to win the friendship and influence of others to obtain a greater share of happiness from life. You can be respected, honored, and become a leader in your community.

If you are not fully satisfied with your present condition and circumstances; if you long for greater success or more money; if you are not able to influence others to the extent you desire, the reporter would advise you to write at once for free copy of this great work now being given away by the Columbia Scientific Academy.

Mrs. R. C. Young of 312 Indiana Street, Lawrence, Kan., recently sent for copy of this book. After carefully examining it and testing the methods of personal influence on her friends and associates, she makes the following statements in a letter to a friend: "The instructions given by the Columbia Scientific Academy have been worth to me more than all the previous reading of my life. I wish every woman in this country could read their grand book."

Fred Perkins, of South Haven, Mich., says: "I have been in great demand since I read the work of the Columbia Scientific Academy. People are amazed and mystified at the things I do. I believe I could make $25 per day reading character alone if I were to charge for my services. If anyone would have told I would receive so much wonderful information I would have thought him crazy."

Mrs. Effie Watson, of Martinsville, Ind., says: "Could I have had access to such information in past years I could have avoided many misfortunes. This work of the Columbia Scientific Academy shall be my guiding star the remaining days of my life."

If you will send your name and address to the Columbia Scientific Academy, Dept. 159 V, 1931 Broadway, New York City, this book will be sent you absolutely free, postage prepaid. On account of the great expense involved in preparing this book, the Columbia Scientific Academy requests that only people who are especially interested write for free copy—only those who desire to achieve greater success and better their condition in life.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were but awkward their mediumistic gifts, have, after a few sittings been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Orowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Securely packed, and sent postage paid from the manufacturer, for $1.00. Address:

SPIRITUAL HARP

A collection of Vocal Music for the Choir, Congregation and Social Circles. By J. M. Peebles and J. O. Barrett; E. H. Bailey, Musical Editor. New edition. Culled from a wide field of literature with the most critical care, free from all theological bias, throbbing with the soul of inspiration, embodying the principles and virtues of the spiritual philosophy, set to the most cheerful and popular music (nearly all original) and adapted to all occasions, it is doubtless the most attractive work of the kind ever published. Its beautiful songs, duets and quartets, with piano, organ or melodeon accompaniment, adapted both to public meetings and the social circles. Cloth, $1.25; postage, 14 cents.

A Very Interesting Book for All.

Philosophy of Spiritual Intercourse. This work contains a graphic account of the very wonderful spiritual developments at the house of Rev. Dr. Phelps, Stratford, Conn., and similar cases in all parts of the country. This volume is the first from the author directly upon the subject of Spiritualism, and has stood the test of many years. Cloth, $1.26; postage 10c.

Views of Our Heavenly Home.

By Andrew Jackson Davis. A highly interesting work. Price, 75 cents. Postage 6 cents.

HARMONICS OF EVOLUTION.

The Philosophy of Individual Life, Based Upon Natural Science

As taught by modern masters of law. By Florence Huntley. An exceedingly interesting and distinctly valuable contribution to the literature of evolution, unfolding its laws from the deeper and clearer spiritual aspect, and indicating the defects of the Darwinian theory. Spiritualists and Materialists alike can gain much from its perusal. Price, finely bound in cloth, $2.

The Science of Spirit Return.

By Charles Dawbarn. A scientific rehearsal that is truly interesting. Price, 10 cents.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE,

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

H. D., M. D. Q. Many, and many times I have been called to see the sick and by talking with the messenger have arrived at a conclusion as regards the difficulty before seeing the patient, but on arrival at the house and on the threshold of the sickroom door have heard a voice as distinctly to me as if some person whispered in my ear, mention a disease entirely different from that which I had been thinking about. When this first occurred I have often looked around to see if there was any one near me, but there never was; it troubled me greatly and I fought against it, went on my own line of thought and investigation with disastrous results until I would fall back on what I heard and then the patient would begin to improve. I have long since learned not to disregard the voice, and have been very successful in practice. This voice never says more than one word—as pneumonia, phthisis, liver, brain, etc.

A. Many physicians have related to me in confidential conversation similar experiences. One especially, whose opinion in critical cases was held by those who consulted him as almost infallible, said that whenever he was called to a patient, he knew the moment the summons came what the disease was, if he could give assistance, or if death was imminent or certain. He always found his impressions verified by subsequent events.

When such impressions are intense they are received as objective and like a voice, or clairaudiently. The true physician who takes deep interest in his patients, and has given his concentrated attention to the study of disease, is specially prepared to receive such impressions, and he may do so without recognizing their source. He may be entirely skeptical and believe they are the result of intense activity of his own mind. Yet if he understood this helpful guidance the conditions would be better, and more would be received. It may further be suggested that physicians who in this life loved their profession, as a means of alleviating suffering; who found pleasure in the help they gave others, would continue their kind offices, by impressing those able to receive. It would seem almost unnecessary, after the foregoing explanation, to emphasize the advice to all who are susceptible to such impressions, to receive and profit by them.

"Hopeful": Q. Would you advise one suffering from consumption to go to Florida or Colorado? Physicians advise a change of climate.

A. The most cruel thing physicians do is this constant advice to "change climate." When they are at a loss for any other remedy they hold out the delusive hope that a journey, usually beyond the means of the patient, may bring relief. If the patient is unable to go, at least the friends are subject to regret that the journey was not taken.

The best place as a rule for sick persons is at home if they can be made comfortable there, and if they have means to travel far, this is assured, and if they cannot be made comfortable at home, they cannot seek a foreign climate.

The sympathetic attention of friends, the luxury of having everything as pleases, the thousand privileges home alone furnishes, outweigh any advantages brought by a change. Travel is wearing on those in good health, and is especially so on the sick. The dust in the air of Florida and California is trying to healthy lungs, and especially irritating to diseased. The air of Colorado is purer than that of the plains, but its rarity more than compensates. The mountain air is not as pure as has been assumed. M. Binet, of the Pasteur Institute, has recently examined the ice from the glaciers of Mount Blanc and found it "peopled with microbes," of a great many different species. The snow from which the glaciers are formed caught these germs from the winds sweeping over the mountains. Hence the air of the highest Alps must bear these microbic germs.

The death rate of Denver, compared with Atlanta, which has a climate nearly like that of Northern Florida, may be taken as an illustration. In 1900 the deaths in Atlanta were 2,387; in Denver, 2,484. In the former city the cause of death was pre-eminently from malaria, and its scondary effects; in the latter, consumption, rheumatism and cancer. Thus the very place which has been heralded as the mecca of the consumptive, has the highest death rate from that disease. This high ratio may be explained by the great number of patients who take refuge in the city. Granting this, it remains that the rarefied air is not a panacea for inflamed lungs, nor destructive of microbe germs.

There are cases of nervous exhaustion, overwork, and depletion, where travel and rest in some quiet place is to be recommended. It becomes necessary to go away from the duties, cares and responsibilities which will be taken if the patient remain until there is an inevitable collapse. New scenes to take the attention, and new associations to awaken thought and prevent recurrence to the old ruts.

If you have the means, and the strength, travel and a change of climate may be well enough, but if you have not, do not harbor the thought that your return to health depends on such change. Make the most of the advantage home furnishes. The sunshine is as life-giving in New Hampshire as Florida; the air is purer, the waters far better. Keep out in the air, in the light and heat of the sun. Better sleep in a tent under the trees than a close room. Open the windows wide so that the chamber may be without a close or tainted odor. The most poisonous thing is foul air. It is not only laden with poison, but supplies food for the most virulent forms of disease germs.

Avoid worry, avoid fatigue, taking exercise to its limit, avoid all things which deplete the vital powers.

Mattie W. Howard. Q. Where in Victor Hugo's works is the following quotation to be found? "To abandon these spiritual phenomena to credulity is to commit treason against human reason. Nevertheless we see them always rejected and always reappearing. They date not their advent from yesterday."

A. In his essay on William Shakspeare, a posthumous publication. The erudite Emmette E. Coleman writes me that he does not know whether this book has been translated and published in English or not.

John McLean: Q. When was Jerusalem founded, and by whom?

A. All that is known about the early history of Jerusalem is found in the Bible, and its paraphrase by Josephus. According to its text, it was the stronghold of the Jebusites, and hence was called Jebus. The Jebusites were a part of the Canaanites, whose land God gave to the Israelites, and commanded them to destroy. According to biblical Chronology that was B. C. 1450. It was assigned by God to the tribe of Benjamin, but although the Israelites captured and occupied a part of the country, the capital, Jerusalem, was held by its rightful owners, and defied them by its strength for nearly four hundred years. B. C. 1048 King David by uniting the warlike tribes of Israel felt strong enough to attack this last stronghold, which for 400 years had defied the people of God. It appears to have fallen easily into the hands of David's captain, as the event is passed with briefest mention, although probably the mandate to destroy all but the virgins, given by Jehovah as applicable to the Canaanites was literally executed.

Henceforth the stronghold of Jebus became strictly an Israelitish city, and its fortifications constantly strengthened. It has been compared in wealth and splendor to Tyre, Babylon, etc., but aside from the heated fancy by Bible writers there is no record in ancient history bearing out such assumption. Situated as it was in narrow confines, surrounded by deserts over which roamed tribes of savages, it would have been impossible for its people to acquire great wealth. Nothing remains of Solomon's famous temple that can be identified.

A Challenge to Anti-Suffragists.

The most renowned statesmen and thinkers of the present and last century have been advocates of equal suffrage. Among these are President Roosevelt, Senator G. F. Hoar, James A. Garfield, George William Curtis, William Dudley Foulke, George W. Cable, President Charles F. Thwing, Bishop Bowman, Bishop Simpson, Bishop Hurst, William Lloyd Garrison, Theodore Parker, Henry Ward Beecher, Benjamin F. Wade, T. W. Higginson, Charles Kingsley, Joseph Cook, Charles Sumner, William H. Seward, Chief Justice Chase, Wendell Phillips, Ralph Waldo Emerson, John G. Whittier and Henry W. Longfellow.

Among those of our own state are: Abraham Lincoln, Senators Palmer, Farwell, Cullom and Mason, Governor Fifer, Governor Altgeld and Governor Yates, State Senators Charles Bogardus, Reuben W. Coon, Isaac Miller Hamilton, George H. Munroe, George Bass, Henry M. Dunlap, Walter Warder and Thomas C. MacMillan, Judges M. F. Tuley, James B. Bradwell, Alfred Sample, S. P. McConnell, Thos. G. Windes, Thomas E. Tipton, John Barton Payne, Harvey B. Hurd, J. M. Riggs and James Shaw, Rev. N. D. Hillis, William J. Hynes, Samuel S. Page, Dr. Arthur J. Reynolds, Dr. H. W. Thomas, William G. Ewing, Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Chas. A. Blanchard, president of Wheaton College, S. R. Lyons, president of Monmouth College, E. H. Gary, chairman of the board of directors of the Federal Steel Company, M. H. Chamberlain, president of McKendrie College, Joel M. Longnecker, George W. Underwood, Ethelbert Callahan, Jonathan Merriam, A. F. Nightingale, Edgar B. Tolman, W. R. Jewell, J. A. Crain and others of equal renown whom space forbids us to name.

I challenge anyone to make a list of anti-suffragists equal in ability, renown or advanced thinking.

THE GOLDEN JUBILEE

MANY VETERANS TAKE PART—AN INTERESTING GATHERING OF MEN AND WOMEN WHO BELIEVE SPIRITUALISM IS THE POWER THAT GOVERNS THE UNIVERSE.

With many prominent Spiritualists from outside cities present, and receiving greetings from Spiritualist bodies in foreign lands, the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia began the celebration of their golden jubilee at the handsome Temple, Twelfth and Thompson streets. Flowers of all kinds, particularly the sunflower, decorated the chancel, and white and gold draperies were everywhere festooned. The Temple was packed at the morning and evening exercises.

The society is the oldest Spiritualist organization in the world, having been founded fifty years ago by Robert Hare, J. P. Lanning, Isaac Barber and others. Messages were said to have been received from the founders at last night's exercises. The feature of yesterday's celebration was the address last evening of President H. D. Barrett, of the National Association of Spiritualists. He said in part:

WHAT SPIRITUALISM HAS DONE.

"A new truth was born to the world when this association was organized fifty years ago, the truth that there is no death, that this thing death is only another name for change, that this life is only the seeming, and the life beyond the real. Spiritualism has done wonders for the world already. At a communication from spirit land Alexander, Czar of all the Russias, in 1861 was inspired to liberate 60,000,000 serfs and make them free men. This is a historical fact that cannot now be disputed.

"About the same time Abraham Lincoln received a message from the spirit land that caused him to make up his mind to strike away the shackles from the limbs of 6,000,000 slaves. This fact is another that cannot be disputed. If it has done this much for rulers of the world what will it not do for common humanity. Spiritualism rules the souls of all who espouse it. It guides their every action. And why? Because it is the only religion that has given man a rational conception of God. Our God is no angry God, no mere God that looks like man, but an infinite influence presiding over all.

"Spiritualism has taken this book out of the realm of doubt," continued Mr. Barrett, laying his hand on the old Bible which was presented to the association by the late George W. Childs. "We believe that when Christ reappeared to the Apostles he was a materialized spirit. The aim of Spiritualism is to give to the world the civilization of the soul. While all others doubt the certainty of a future life, we know there is one life everlasting, and that this state here is only the seeming portion of it."

Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader presided over the evening exercises. A feature of the gathering was the presence on the stage of a dozen or more "veterans" who have been Spiritualists since the association was founded. All of them are over 80 and a few have passed 90 years. Among these were John Lynch, John Langham, W. H. Jones, B. B. Hill and Mrs. Lydia B. Whiteman, who was a nurse in the army during the civil war. Milton Allen, the aged husband of Mrs. Rebecca Thomas Allen, the medium, who it is claimed got the message fifty years ago to start the society, was also present.

Mrs. Minnie Brown, a medium, officiated at the "Roll Call" when the names of all the deceased members were read off.

MESSAGE FROM SPIRITS.

She said: "Mrs. Annie Lynch is here with us and sends greetings. She has a wreath of forty sunflowers, and says this gathering is magnificent. Robert Hare says: 'It is a splendid celebration. I would like to occupy a front pew.'"

Messages were also said to have been received from Benjamin Benner, Isaac Wren and several others.

Mrs. Cadwallader read a cable message from the British Spiritualists, in session at Walsall, England. "Loving greetings to all," it read, and was signed "Wilkinson, president."

The music at all the services was under the direction of Professor J. Frank Bacon, assisted by the Temple choir. President F. J. Keffer spoke at the opening of the jubilee celebration in the morning, and A. A. Groom presided at the "Progressive Lyceum" exercises in the afternoon. Rev. B. F. Austin, formerly of the Methodist Conference of Toronto, offered the evening invocation.

YOUNG SPIRITUALISTS SPEAK.

Young Spiritualists were in charge of the services commemorating the golden jubilee of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia at the Temple, Twelfth and Thompson streets, last night. The visitors were welcomed by Egbert Benner, the president of the Sunflower Club.

A number of young persons spoke on the theme, "Why I Am a Spiritualist." Rev. B. F. Austin, of Toronto, delivered an address on "What Spiritualism Has Done for the Young People and What the Young People Can Do for Spiritualism." J. Clegg Wright, of Washington, gave a resume of the evolution of Spiritualism during the last fifty years, and President H. D. Barrett, of the National Spiritualists' Association, spoke on the "Young People of Spiritualism." Spirit messages were delivered by Miss Margaret Gaule and Mrs. Carrie Twing.

SPIRITUALISTS HAVE A BIG DAY.

The believers in Spiritualism, seventy strong, visited Independence Hall, saw the Mayor and rode through Fairmount Park all in the rain and completed the program of the second morning of the four days' golden jubilee of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia. In the afternoon a meeting was held at the Temple, Twelfth and Thompson streets. Mediums were present at the afternoon session. The Spiritualists arm in arm walked through the historic old building, looked at the relics, saw the stand where the Liberty Bell should have been and signed the register.

Then Captain Francis Keffer, hero of the Mexican as well as the civil war, shouted "Fall in!" and the procession moved upon the City Hall.

The Spiritualists arm in arm walked the City Hall until the Mayor arrived. President Harrison D. Barrett, of the National Association, was the center of a large crowd most of this wait. One woman rushed excitedly to him and exclaimed, "Oh, Mr. Barrett, I have consulted a medium on the McIlroy will and she says we will win."

"That is good; it is good," said Mr. Barrett as he brushed a long tendril of hair from his forehead, and then explained to a reporter that the woman took a great interest in Spiritualistic seances, and that the McIlroy will contest had meant much to her. McIlroy left thousands of dollars to the Spiritualists' organization, his will was contested in court and the presiding judge ruled that being a Spiritualist was a sign of mental derangement. The case will go to a higher court.

The Spiritualists made no offer to be seated in the Mayor's big reception room until Captain Keffer exclaimed: "Sit down, this is a public building; make yourselves at home."

Among those in the party was Milton Allen, husband of the medium who received the first message from spirit land to organize the Philadelphia Association. Mrs. Allen is suffering from a broken shoulder and cannot attend the meetings.

Captain Francis Keffer opened the reception with the Mayor by a short address. He told of Philadelphia being the cradle of liberty, where people might worship as they pleased. Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, told of the Spiritualists' love for their flag. Dr. B. F. Austin, of Canada, said that he was a Spiritualist from the North Pole, and that Canada wanted to annex the United States. Mrs. Carrie S. Twing, of New York, and J. Clegg Wright, of Ohio, also extended greetings to the Mayor. President Barrett decorated His Honor with the Spiritualists' badge.

Mayor Ashbridge answered by extending all courtesies of the city to the convention, called Philadelphia the city of humanitarianism, and closed by humorously wishing that the inclement weather would not dampen the convention's spirits.

"He is a fine man," said the delegates as they filed out to take special cars for the Fairmount Park tour.

WOMAN.

Dedicated to the Woman's Progressive Union of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, golden jubilee celebration, May, 1902, by Mary T. Longley, Washington, D. C.

Hail, Women of the era bright—
That brought a world of Love to light
And gave the token—"God is good
In all his ways, when understood."
Hail! Women of the century free,
That gave tremendous force to ye,
That proved immortal life for all—
Eternal power for great or small.

Ye women of the present day,
Have active been within the fray
When Error battle seeks with Truth—
Engaging help from age or youth;
But lo! before the mighty blows
Of Truth, the foe e'er downward goes—
And Liberty is marching on
With Truth and Justice routing wrong.

Within the fifty years agone
The light of Truth has constant shone—
And Woman traveling in its course,
Has ever felt its glorious force!
And with it, Angel help and love
Empowering her from Heaven above,
To onward press from day to day
Along the higher, better way.

Thus through the darkness and the storm,
She traveled on with each reform,
And lent her powers to all that's good,
And by the side of Justice stood—
Demanding recognition there.
Nor would she sink to dark despair;
But ever faithful, ever true,
She brought the promised land to view.

And so to-day we dedicate
(To you, dear friends, who celebrate
The century half of golden works)
Our song, in which a blessing lurks.
To-day, our women stand serene—
Each one a very loyal queen—
In each reform, in every good
That makes for human brotherhood.

THE ADDRESS OF WELCOME,

by Capt. T. J. Keffer, president of the First Association, was as follows:

My Friends and Co-workers:—It is with pleasure that I greet you this morning.

Fifty years ago there was born into the scientific and religious world, a child whose name is called The First Association of Spiritualists, and we are here this morning to celebrate its fiftieth birthday—its Golden Jubilee.

But while we are enjoying this event, let us not forget the noble men and women who were the pioneers of this great movement, in building up the philosophy and the teaching of Modern Spiritualism.

They were the men and women that had to stem the tide of opposition and hear the sneers of unbelievers; but they faltered not—ever marching to gain the victory; and as their ranks began to thin, as time passed on, and old age and disease called them to their home in the spirit world—like a grand army, hundreds rallied to the standard that these pioneers had planted, and as they, too, passed to the higher life, thousands stood ready to fill their places; so that to-day we may well say that Spiritualists are numbered by thousands—aye—millions. You will find them all over the civilized world.

I therefore welcome you to this Temple, the home of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, as it is the oldest Spiritualist Association in the whole world.

I welcome the officers and members of the National Association of Spiritualists and all officers, members and representatives of all other Spiritualist societies, and all mediums who have been the means of demonstrating the truth of the return of our dear friends from the other side of life.

After many years of struggle we have accomplished the object of our desire and that is to be the owner of a building in which to promulgate and demonstrate our philosophy, and this temple, dedicated one year ago, is the fulfillment of that desire.

We feel that we have a place among the religions of the world, and that our is the mission to bring into conscious unity the seen and the unseen worlds.

Again I bid you welcome, on this our Golden Jubilee.

ADDRESS BY B. B. HILL.

This occasion marks an epoch of unusual interest in the history of Spiritualism, and this time-honored association.

It is with no small degree of pleasure that I participate in this Golden Jubilee, by adding my testimony in evidence in the cause of truth and a brief report of my career as a veteran in its ranks. Not that I can claim the honor of being a veteran in this parent association, as before becoming allied with it, my labor was in other fields, so I must be termed a veteran at large.

Nearly fifty years ago, my attention was drawn to this all important subject. During this half century, I have investigated its phenomena, studied its philosophy, and aided in the advancement of its truths by publishing to the world the revelations handed down to us, from the world beyond the boundaries of mortal life.

One of the first books I read in the early days of my investigations, was that of Prof. Hare, of Philadelphia, the noble man who had the courage born of his convictions. When he found that demonstrated truth set aside his former theories, he rendered to the world a full acknowledgment by writing his most interesting and important work.

Prof. Hare being an eminent scientist, began his investigations upon a scientific basis, by the use of various and sundry devices to test the phenomena through one of the best mediums known at that time. These mechanical devices were illustrated in his published work. Being a mechanic myself, it occurred to me that without any difficulty, I could construct a similar device, from his illustration, and demonstrate for myself the truth of his published statement through other psychic instruments. This I did to my entire satisfaction.

The instrument constructed by me was a simple device, as follows: First, a small platform of a size suitable to rest the hands of a medium upon, the platform resting on three wheels, two at one end, and one at the other. Near the center, from this wheel a band ran to a round disk twelve inches in diameter, on the side of which was a grooved wheel to receive the band from the wheel below. Upon the side of the disk, opposite the medium, was the alphabet, around the circle of the disk, which was supported by a standard resting upon the platform. The investigator sat facing the alphabetical dial, while the medium sat facing the side which was blank. A pointer was arranged, so that when the dial was turned to bring a certain letter to the pointer and stopped, that was the letter wanted to spell the word. The machine was operated by rolling it back and forth upon the table, bringing the desired letter to the pointer, to complete the communication. Thus I was enabled to demonstrate to myself conclusively, through this machine constructed by myself, the fact of spirit intercourse between the two worlds, just as Prof. Hare had done before me.

In investigating Spiritualism, all along the line I have found truth, as well as met ridicule and opposition in various forms, but having had the great object in view of gaining the truth, have pressed steadily onward, ignoring all opposition. The truth has given me freedom from a false religious education, and false theories, and I stand forth to-day untrammeled and ready to follow the beacon light of truth let it lead where it may.

The First Association of Spiritualists has marched steadily forward for half a century, in the campaign for truth, liberty and human rights. It has pressed on through sunshine and storm, regardless of opposition. It has done a grand and noble work, and is continuing that work.

This temple in which we are assembled to celebrate this Golden Jubilee, is one of the results of that work. The majority of the pioneers of this time-honored association have been placed on the retired list in this mortal life, but are still marching on in spirit life. Can we doubt that they are with us to-day joyously celebrating this notable event? Those who have the spirit vision, brush aside the veil from time to time, and tell us of our comrades, who are working with us in the interests of this Jubilee.

It seems eminently proper, that the pioneer association of Spiritualists should have been organized in this city, for it was here that the old "Liberty Bell" pealed forth the inspiring tones which heralded liberty to an oppressed people, over a century ago. Its chimes meant liberty in a national sense, but later on the click of the spirit telegraph electrified the world, and told that communication had been established between the two worlds. The pioneers of this association caught the echo of the spirit rap. They listened diligently to the dispatches which came from the spirit shore. Reassured and encouraged they pressed on. To-day you see the result. We have reason to take courage anew and press forward to still greater achievements in the line of truth and progress.

In conclusion, I will only add that this association, organized by so many noble souls, and sustained in the past as well as in the present by earnest workers, has been a bulwark in the cause of Spiritualism. It has made its impress on the century in which we live. It is still loyal to truth, and is marching on to complete its century of work for the promulgation of the great and important truths that have come to the world through Modern Spiritualism from the spirit spheres.

MAYOR SUBJECTED TO PSYCHIC POWER OF SPIRITUALISTS.

Psychic influences yesterday restored Mayor Stoy to health after a two days' indisposition that had confined him to his room, in time for him to extend the greeting of the city to a delegation of members of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia. About fifty members of the society came here, and although they knew the mayor had been so ill that he was confined to his room, they were confident that he would be able to meet them.

He did so at the city hall where he greeted them at noon, and while the mayor did not commit himself as to his belief in psychology, he looked the picture of good health. The ladies of the delegation were delighted that their psychic influences had brought about his restoration to health, and in their gladness at the cordiality of his welcome pinned their mystic badges all over his vest until it was fairly covered.

Day before yesterday the chairman of the committee called up the Mayor's office by long distance telephone from Philadelphia, and asked to have the mayor meet them on their arrival here yesterday.

"Mayor Stoy is ill and confined to his bed and it is more than doubtful that he will be able to be out at all," went the reply back over the wire.

"Please tell the mayor," came the reply of the Spiritualist association, "that he will not remain ill. We shall exert the telepathic waves of psychic influence and power in his behalf, and he will get well."

Yesterday at noon the mayor was temporarily well.

In his office at the city hall he shook hands with about fifty well-dressed and very intelligent appearing members of the association. It was made the occasion of a polite demonstration in favor of woman suffrage also, for Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, of Philadelphia, the first vice-president of the association, and chairman of the arrangement committee, informed the mayor, after returning his personal greetings, that women should not ask the men for the right to vote because women have the right inherently.

"We have the right already, but its exercise is denied us. We give our sons life, and they turn about and prevent us from taking a hand in government," she stated. "We have the right to vote but men have trampled upon us."

Mayor Stoy apologized for any of the trampling which he might have unconsciously done, and said that if all the women who desired to vote were as accomplished as Mrs. Cadwallader, men would not be the only citizens now allowed to go to the polls. He thanked the delegation and the association for its kind thoughts of him and reminded them that very few of the difficulties of public office are ever removed by psychic innuence, but that he was thankful for his restored health.

Then Mrs. Cadwallader pinned an official badge upon the mayor's coat. The badge contained on one side a picture of the hall of the association, an artistic building at Twelfth and Thompson streets, Philadelphia, and on the other side the emblem of the society a sunflower. While the reception was going on Captain Francis J. Keffer, president of the association, discovered Police Captain Maxwell in the building, and recognized him as an old army acquaintance, whom he had not seen since the days of the Civil War. Captain Maxwell was decorated with a sunflower button, at which he felt very happy.

The company dined at one of the hotels and then passed the afternoon at the beach and returned to Philadelphia on a late train in time to attend a performance at a Philadelphia theatre.

The mayor's guests included Captain Francis J. Keffer, president of the First Association; Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, vice-president and chairman of committee of arrangements; Mr. A. Groom, conductor of the Progressive Lyceum and Band of Mercy; Harrison D. Barrett, of Boston, president of the National Spiritualist Association; Mr. R. W. Simpson, of Pittsburg, editor of the "Psychic Era;" Mrs. McVanKirk, vice-president of the Women's Progressive Union; Mrs. S. Snyder, treasurer of the German Spiritual Society, of Philadelphia; Mrs. John Metz, of the Twentieth Century Sunflower Club; Mrs. C. Myers, Mrs. Minnie Brown, Mr. Milton Allen, of Philadelphia, and B. B. Hill, of Philadelphia; and Mrs. M. C. Barrett, of Boston, associate editor of the Banner of Light.—Atlantic Review, Atlantic City, N. J.

GENERAL SURVEY.

Sunday, June 1, Lyman C. Howe lectures at Freeville, N. Y., morning and afternoon. July 6, Clara Watson will lecture. Regular camp opens July 26 and closes August 12. Speakers engaged, Lizzie Harlow, Haydenville, Mass.; H. D. Barrett, Boston; Cora L. V. Richmond, Chicago; Mary E. Lease, New York City; Moses Hull, Lily Dale, N. Y.; J. T. Morrison, Ithaca, N. Y.; the Parker Bowen Concert Company will furnish music. The Parks Male Quartette engaged for June 1, July 6, and August 17. A. C. Stone, secretary.

A. Eldelbach writes from Flatonia, Texas: "I find the people are inquiring since Mr. and Mrs. Kates stopped off with us and gave us two lectures on their run through Texas. They certainly are doing much good. We now have the promise of a visit from Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley for June 2 and 3. People are anxious for her arrival. We need lectures and tests."

W. F. Bellman, secretary, writes: "The State Spiritualists Association of Kansas will hold its first annual convention in Topeka, Kans., June 6, 7, 8 and 9. A good programme is being arranged, and a general spiritual awakening may be expected. Good speakers and mediums have been secured. Among those expected to participate are Geo. W. Kates, N. S. A. missionary, Washington, D. C.; D. W. Hull, Norton, Kansas; Mrs. Etta Seaman Bledsoe, Topeka, Kans.; Judge H. H. Benson, Granfield, Kans.; Mrs. Bessie J. Bellman, Howard, Kans.; Mrs. Zaida B. Kates, Washington, D. C.; A. Scott Bledsoe, Topeka, Kans.; Mrs. M. Bartel, Cripple Creek, Colo., and Mrs. Inez Wagner, of Topeka, Kans. Special rates on nearly all railroads in Kansas, and from Kansas City and St. Joe, Mo., have been secured on the certificate plan. The fare will be one and one-third for the round trip. For further information, address me at No. 213 E. 7th street, Topeka, Kansas. Please send stamp for reply."

M. B. Philp writes: "A large audience greeted Mrs. Maggie Waite at the Englewood Spiritual Union, on Sunday evening, May 18, and all went away well pleased. She will be with us again on Sunday evening, June 1. The Rev. Harry Moore is filling an engagement with us for May and June. He is well liked and his lectures are fine. On the 25th he gave an excellect lecture on Joan of Arc, and followed it with a flower christening. He was assisted by Mrs. Maggie Waite. Sometime during June he will give a lecture on The Woman of Endor. On the same evening there will be another Spiritualistic christening. Our society is in a flourishing condition. Although the nights were warm and the hall crowded on both occasions, everybody enjoyed themselves, as our hall is well ventilated, as we get air from the four points of the compass."

M. A. Spring writes: "The Summerland Spiritualist Society are holding mediums' meetings on Sunday afternoon that are proving very satisfactory. Our tenth annual camp-meeting will open on July 27 and close on Aug. 3. Will have good speakers and mediums and hope to have a large attendance and do much good."

Mrs. H. J. Eligh writes: "The people of Bay City and West Bay City, Mich., have been highly entertained for the past three Sundays. Marguerite St. Omer Briggs, of Detroit, lectured for the Spiritualists Society, giving two lectures each Sunday, morning and evening. After each lecture she gave messages and tests, all of which were understood, recognized and appreciated. She also gave two circles for the benefit of our Ladies Aid Society while here. At the close of our last meeting Dr. Briggs spoke a few earnest words to the Spiritualists of both cities in behalf of our Ladies' Aid Society."

W. M. Kaugh writes from Waverly, Kansas: "We have the pleasure of having Mrs. Laura B. Payne, of Topeka, Kansas, with us. She has been lecturing to large audiences. She is one of the best speakers that ever took the platform, and her singing can not be beaten. She has done a world of good here. The people have taken a great interest in her meetings. We have been very fortunate to get her. She had a little vacation between now and the middle of June when she will start on a missionary trip through Oklahoma and Texas."

"Human Culture and Cure, Marriage, Sexual Development, and Social Upbuilding." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL. D. A most excellent and very valuable work, by the Dean of the College of Fine Forces, and Author of other important volumes on Health, Social Science, Religion, etc. Price, cloth, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

"Just How to Wake the Solar Plexus." By Elizabeth Towne. Valuable for health. Price 25 cents.

Three Journeys Around the World
—OR—
Travels in the Pacific Islands,

New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, India, and other Oriental countries. By J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D. In this splendid large book Dr. Peebles has concentrated a vast amount of valuable information. It is exceedingly entertaining and readable, and Spiritualism as he found it everywhere in his travels receives due attention, making the book of special value and interest to Spiritualists. 454 large pages, finely bound, at the price of $1.50.

"THE DREAM CHILD,"

A Fascinating Romance of Two Worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price, cloth, 75 cents. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times.

THE DESCENT OF MAN.

By Charles Darwin. Cloth, gilt top, 75 cents. On its appearance it aroused at once a storm of mingled wrath, wonder and admiration. In elegance of style, charm of manner, and deep knowledge of natural history, it stands almost without a rival among scientific works.

AFTER HER DEATH.

The Story of a Summer. By Lilian Whiting. Pervaded with pure and beautiful spirituality of thought. Instructive and helpful to all who love and seek the higher and finer ways of spiritual experience. Price, $1.00.

WOMAN: Four Centuries of Progress. A Lecture delivered at the Freethinker's International Congress, Chicago, Ill., October, 1893. By Susan H. Wixon. Price, 10c.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

Historical and critical review, with replies to an objection. By G. W. Brown, M. D. Price, 15c.

Practical Methods to Insure Success.

A valuable little work, full of practical instruction in matters pertaining to physical, mental and spiritual health. Worth many times its cost. Price 10 cents.

ASTRAL WORSHIP By J. H. Hill, M.D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

The Christ Question Settled,

Jesus, Man, Medium, Martyr. A symposium by W. E. Coleman, J. S. Loveland, Hudson Tuttle, Moses Hull, J. R. Buchanan, B. B. Hill, Rabbi I. M. Wise, Col. Ingersoll—and what the spirits say about it. By J. M. PEEBLES, M. D. Whether this book settles the question or not, it will be found eminently entertaining, and brings together a mass of evidence to establish the historical character of Jesus. A large volume. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "potteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

MAHOMET His Birth, Character and Doctrine. By Edward Gibbon. This is No. 6 of the Library of Liberal Classics. It is conceded to be historically correct, and so exact and perfect in every detail as to be practically beyond the reach of adverse criticism. This work will be found intensely interesting. Price, 25 cents.

Crimes of Preachers.

An interesting book along its line and useful to Spiritualists attacked by the clergy and their followers. Price 25 cents; for sale at this office.

THE WORLD BEAUTIFUL.

Series one, two and three. By Lilian Whiting. Three choice volumes, each complete in itself, in which spirituality is related to everyday life in such a way as to make the world beautiful. Price, $1.00 each.

STANDING UP FOR JESUS,

Or what the Editor of the Freethinker's Magazine thinks of him. Price, 4 cents; twenty-five copies for 50 cents.

SPIRITUAL SONGSTER.

By Mattie E. Hull. Thirty-eight of Mrs. Hull's sweetest songs, adapted to popular music, for the use of congregations, circles and families. Price, 10 cents, or $7 per hundred.

A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

OLD AND NEW PSYCHOLOGY

By W. J. Colville. Beports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume. Price, $1.00.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,
Is Now Located at

No. 1087 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading symptom.

SOMEWHAT CRITICAL.

Education—The Need of the Hour.

In a recent issue of The Progressive Thinker is an article from the pen of the Grand Old Man of Spiritualism, on the subject of Education and the Morris Pratt Institute. The professor is a genius in the art of special pleading, and if we allowed ourselves to be caught with the honeyed phrases that come so smoothly from his pen, we would no doubt fall down ad cry, "Great is the Professor! Hear ye him." Because we had such workers, as he mentions in the days gone by is no sign that we shall continue to have them, unless we duplicate the conditions under which they were produced. The professor says we can learn all we wish to know of logic and grammar in the common schools, and he is opposed to the endowed college because it means an aristocracy. Oh, fudge!

The professor knows, as well as myself, that in the average school which most of our people are able to attend, the last thing on earth that is taught is a system of logic. Text-books there are, it is true, and a plenty, such as they are, but let a pupil show so much as a sign of independent thought and research and he is at once looked upon as a queer fellow. He must accept the statements of his teachers and the books as blindly as a young robin swallows the worm that it supposes the mother is giving it when it hears a noise at the side of the nest and something is placed in its wide-open mouth.

Let a student in one of our average public schools so much as intimate that he is a Spiritualist, and that his people are the same, and he is at once made the object of sarcastic remarks and social ostracism on the part of his fellow students and teachers. The only way in which he can hope to become popular and hold the position that of right belongs to him on account of his scholarship and ability, is by selling himself and pretending that he is one of their number.

The writer knows what he is talking about on the above question, as he has been through the mill, and you may talk about our free public non-sectarian schools, and you are talking of a nonentity, of the definition of nothing, a footless stocking without a leg. Our schools are sectarian, and in our state institutions for the training of teachers we are compelled to sit and listen to the reading of the scriptures and the mumbling of the Lord's prayer so-called, or lose our standing. The writer knows, as he has been there right in the state where it is proposed to establish a school which Spiritualists can attend and receive the training in the higher branches of learning without being compelled to swallow the orthodox bolus that is forced upon us in every other institution of learning.

Whatever may have been the standing of the speakers of the past, and we had some mighty men and women among them—and the writer feels that when a list of the pioneers in the cause is given that it is not complete without the name of his mother, Mrs. S. E. Warner-Bishop—the crop of speakers that is coming up to-day to take the place of the veterans is woefully lacking in many of the essential elements of power to convince and hold their audiences. Our lack of organization, our lack of educational facilities, our lack of almost everything that tends to elevate the race as a whole, has been responsible for this. The day of the iconoclast has gone by, and—the day of construction is here.

The writer has no more use for the orthodox concept of a god than the professor has, but he does claim that he has as much right to invoke the forces of nature and the guides in order to bring himself in harmony with the unseen forces, as the professor has to read a poem by Denton, or Lizzie Doten, or some one else, for the same purpose. Let me have my invocation, the professor his poem. It will hurt neither one of us, nor will it hurt our audiences, in fact, it will do them good.

The declaration of principles seems to trouble the learned professor a good deal, and the fact of Moses Hull being at the head of the Institute seems to trouble him also. The writer does not wish to be personal, but perhaps if the N. S. A. had adopted his declaration of principles, which even the professor could not explain to an average audience in one day or in one year, there would not be so much trouble as to the creed (?) of the N. S. A. And if the professor had been chosen as the head of the Institute, then it, too, would have been a goodly thing and a joy forever.

The writer is frank in his criticism, and is free to say that to the man up the tree it looks as if in the past few years the professor has put himself in the position of the little children, who if you won't play their way, won't play at all. Rule or ruin. That is the motto of a certain class, and we are afraid the professor has joined himself with these enemies of all progress.

It is the fashion of such to cry down all organization, when every phenomenon of nature repeats the story of organization over and over. There is not an atom that is not an organized entity, from monad to the soul of man. Paul's old story of the body and its members and the patrician Memmius' allegory to the plebs at Rome, of the strike of the members of the body against the stomach, are as applicable to the present situation as they were in the days when they were first related. We must unite or perish. Guerilla warfare never yet won a great cause. There must always be united systematic effort. The rebellion was never conquered as long as there was no united plan of campaign and each general was left to his own sweet will, but when at last they were all united under the command of Grant and moved as parts of one great machine, then the victory came and the Union was preserved. It was the dreamers and schemers like Sumner and Greeley, who threw away the fruits of the victory and cursed the country with the Solid South and the Solid North to gratify their personal ambitions and to overthrow a man whom they thought was not of the same standing as themselves.

We want none of this in Spiritualism. What we want is equal rights for all and special privileges to none. And while the present organization of Spiritualists may not be all that our ideals stand for, it is the means to the end, and is the best that we have. Let us stand by it then, and do all that we can to uphold the hands of those who are seeking to elevate the standard of our workers and present to the public, advocates of our cause who can at least speak the English language correctly, and who have at least an ordinary knowledge of the correct use of the words that they use.

It will hurt no student to be able to quote the Bible and to be able to quote it correctly. Two-thirds of our mediums and two-thirds of the ordinary orthodox clergymen are not able to correctly quote some of the most commonly used passages from the Bible. The book or collection of books is one of the greatest storehouses of mystic and Spiritualistic lore that the world has ever known, and when people learn to treat it as the writings of the mediums of those days, and to analyze it as they would any other book of its class, then it will cease to be the bugaboo that it seems to be to men of the professor's stamp.

We apprehend that is the only way in which our Brother Moses intends to treat it, and we have no fear that our students will be compelled to accept any creed or declaration of principles unless they choose to, but they will be enabled to learn the principles of the higher thought and to present them logically to the world free from the bondage of the sectarian textbooks of our average schools.

The people have been taught in the past by some of our mediums and alleged seers to accept anything and everything that came to us, regardless of the source, and that the dear spirits would do it all. Now is the time to change this and realize the fact that our own spirits have as much to do with some of the phenomena as those of the decarnated intelligences. Let us, then, stand all together and support our National organization. The people in the world of politics and business will never respect us until we respect ourselves, and when the politicians find that we have votes and are an organized living body of thinking men and women, they will soon give us the rights that belong to us. But if we hang off and drivel along at the coat-tail of individualism, as free-lances, our hands against every man and every man against us, we may soon expect that we will be legislated out of existence as completely as though we had never been.

We have said enough in this and hope that from all over the land will come the donations to make the Institute a success, and that the people will not allow themselves to be led aside into the old swamp of individualism from the firm highway of organization.

Items from Philadelphia.

The Philadelphia Spiritual Society will close its meetings the last Sunday of this month, and convene again the first Sunday in September.

We have had very successful meetings the entire season, opening last September with Mrs. Minnie Brown, of Philadelphia, for our worker, a month long to be remembered by every one, it being the month in which Mr. McKinley was so ruthlessly torn from this expression of life.

Our rostrum was occupied during the month of October by Mrs. May S. Pepper. Her meetings met with the usual good success. November, Mr. and Mrs. Kates were our workers. Quite a number seemed pleased with their line of work, and the society has engaged them a month of the coming season.

December the society had Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter engaged for the month, but they were called away after serving two Sundays. January, Mr. Sprague and wife served the society.

February, the sterling little woman, but "big worker," Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn, was on deck, ready and willing to do even more than her duty whenever the call was sounded.

In March we had Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood and wife, of Chicago, Ill., with us. The Professor with his masterly logic causes many to think along lines which none other seems to be able to do. He is so well equipped with information in every department of human knowledge and thought that all societies should consider it a great privilege to hear him. Prof. Lockwood's discourse on Anniversary Sunday was particularly instructive as well as entertaining.

Mrs. Lockwood filled our platform one evening during the month, and answered questions in a very satisfactory manner for the audience. She would do well to form in class in the various cities in which they are called.

April, Mrs. May S. Pepper, of Providence, R. I., again filled our rostrum, as usual crowding our hall to its utmost capacity.

The present month Mr. B. F. Austin, of Toronto, Canada, is filling an engagement with the society. Mr. Austin is a cultured speaker and tries in his way to lead the people up to higher ideals of living.

Mr. W. R. McGlenn, superintendent of the lyceum, is having very successful meetings every Friday evening in behalf of the children. He has adopted this method to raise money to give the little ones a summer outing. M. H.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Mrs. S. W. Moffatt aged 76, passed to spirit life from her home in Wheaton, Ill., on May 22, after an illness of ten weeks. Her husband and six children (three sons and three daughters) survive her to mourn her loss. She was very cultured and refined, and was highly esteemed for her many noble qualities. On account of her own personal experiences, she was led to believe in the fundamental principles of Spiritualism, and was fully prepared for her home in the spheres above. Many of the friends will remember her as the gentle, lovable little mother of Mrs. J. R. Francis.

Passed to spirit life, at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. McMasters, Austin, Ill., May 22, Mr. James Keene, aged 86 years. For over forty years Brother Keene was a firm believer in the truths of Spiritualism, and for many years a reader of The Progressive Thinker. The funeral services were conducted by the writer, and his body laid to rest in Rose Hill, Saturday, May 24.

J. O. M. HEWITT.

James Laughery, of Missouri Valley, Iowa, passed to the higher life, May 6, aged 70 years. He was an old and most respected citizen; had been a life-long Spiritualist, and welcomed his transition to the higher life with pleasure. He was kindly cared for by a loving wife and friends. Services conducted by A. Scott Bledsoe, of Topeka, Kans.

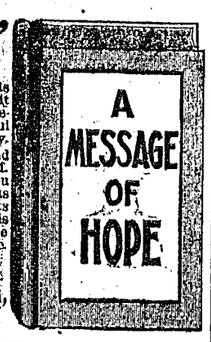
HEALTH RESTORED



The entire country is astonished at the wonderful cures perfected through the method originated by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Mich. This science is a subtle force in nature combined with magnetic medicines, and called by the eminent doctor.

Psychic Science

It has been termed the greatest pain reliever ever known. It is a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system and restores health. It makes no difference how serious or hopeless the case may seem, there is positive hope in this grand science. It has restored the deaf, blind and lame, cured the paralytic, and those suffering from Bright's Disease, Consumption, Stomach Trouble, Catarrh, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Female Troubles, as well as men and women addicted to the liquor, morphine and other vile habits.

Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two month's treatment writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything; I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

"A Message of Hope"

written by Dr. J. M. Peebles, in a plain and concise manner, tells you exactly how and where you can gain perfect health; in fact, it gives you the key to the grandest knowledge known to man. Remember, this book costs you nothing, and it reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday realities of to-day.

Father Tom and the Pope,
Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "potteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachymaichrystal out by the face," says he—"It's Nectar itself, it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his episkolical mouth wid the cuff of his coat. Paper, 45cts.; cloth, 50 cents. The paragraphs are short, suggestive and inspiring. Every one of them leads to something higher, grander, nobler. Price $1.00.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

HEALING, Causes and Effects, By W. F. Phelon, M. D. Deals with the finer mental and spiritual forces as applied to healing. Price, 50 cents.

The New and the Old,

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book of reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality, the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND Other Offerings.

BY EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

This volume contains a selection of the best poems of this gifted author and sterlettes contributed by Clair Tuttle in her charming style. There are 285 pages, with six full-page illustrations, including photogravures of the author and Clair Tuttle. It is bound in blue with aluminum embossing. Many of the poems are especially adapted for recitations.

The Author needs no introduction to the spiritual public. Her songs are among the best in spiritual literature. Epes Sargent said of one of her poems that it was the equal of anything in the language, and that she was the poet of the New Dispensation.

The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."

That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."

Will Carlton: "I have read with great interest."

Sarah Thorpe Thomas, the Humanitarian says: "A most exquisite bouquet * * * * the thoughts echo and re-echo through the deepest recesses of my heart. I have some word of praise for every page."

The author says in the dedication: "To those whose thoughts and longings reach into the unseen Land of Souls, this handful of asphodels, mixed with common flowers, is offered, hoping to give rest and pleasure while waiting at the way stations on the journey thither."

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful number. Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

LIGHT OF EGYPT.

The Second Volume of a Most Valuable Work.

This is the author's posthumous work left in MS. to a few of his private pupils in occultism, and like Volume I. is (a valuable addition and) a library on occult subjects. Spiritual astrology is especially elaborated. Alchemy, Talismans, the Magic Wand, Symbolism, Correspondence, Penetralia, etc., are a few of the subjects treated of in a scholarly and masterly manner, showing the author to be familiar with his subjects. You cannot afford to be without it, as well as all his other books, viz.: The Light of Egypt, Vol. I., bound in cloth, $2; paper, $1. The Light of Egypt, Vol. II., bound in cloth only, $2. Celestial Dynamics, cloth, $1. The Language of the Stars, paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., JUNE 7, 1902. NO. 654.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

NUMBER TWO.

I once heard a man when urged to take some thought of the life to come reply that he would not. He said that among all the religious people he had ever met, there was not one offered for consideration a concept of that life adapted to the necessities of his nature. The crystal rivers, green fields and friendly reunions of the hymn writers he assumed were excused by poetic license, and used really as a sort of mental jam to make it possible to swallow the bitter pill of religion. After listening to them all, he could only think of a soul in heaven as of a feather in a vacuum. So devoid of all human interest did that life seem from the vague intimations given, that he could as easily desire to be the feather as the angel. The life, if any, was incomprehensible, and he therefore had no reason to waste time and pervert faculties which were only of use in dealing with what was in a degree comprehensible.

A weary old woman lay dying. They told her of the redeemed, how they rest neither day nor night from singing the praises of a giant-like god who sat forever on a white throne drinking in the monotonous refrain. Her life had been one of monotonous drudgery, and the idea was revolting. She hoped that having no voice she'd get rid of the singing and just do nothing forever and ever. She was no exception. From amid the desolation of theological thought many of the brightest came forth with the forlorn hope of eternal oblivion,

"Never again to wake and to weep,
Rock me to sleep, mother; rock me to sleep."

Now the spirit life has been represented in too unattractive a light altogether. With what potent spell does Theosophy allure so many of the bright ones into a metaphysical wilderness—an interminable labyrinth of speculative imaginings? Is it with ultimate "cessation of desire," of Nirvana? No, but with the counter proposition—the doctrine of reincarnation. Their evangelists rely upon, preach, teach it more than all else, because in a revolt from the inanities of theology—the impossible heavens and hells of conventional religion; as a drowning man grasps at a straw, so do people of life grasp at the idea of living again in some world a life they can understand and appreciate. And herein lies the weakness of our cause to-day, that so many conspicuous Spiritualists suggest to us a heaven that to a sound mind in a sound body cannot be half so attractive a place as this "grey old earth." Before we get strong men and women enthusiastic about Spiritualism without relinquishing the idea that it is concerned with the bettering this world, we must promise them that the spirit life—the awakening of the consciousness of spiritual things—the development of mediumship is worth striving for, before they are driven into it by sorrow, disease and death:—

"Like a quarry slave at night
Scourged to a dungeon."

The rush is to the Klondike because the other country has not been so well advertised. The truth is not suspected, and it is probable that if all were known leaders instead of lamenting indifference would have to devise restraints to prevent a wild mob rush—a "taking the kingdom by violence." I mean by this resorting to drugs, to magic, to unwholesome means mental and physical for inducing a sensitive condition.

But one says this tendency to say "we know nothing and can find out nothing about any spirit life," indicates an undeveloped condition, an incapacity to appreciate, an inability to deal with spiritual things, and perhaps a lack of power to enjoy that life when ushered into it. Now there is some reason in this, and if the simple truth were generally told and people then were apathetic it would be almost sufficient proof of that. While we may say that death is but a transition comparable to passing from Newfoundland to California, this is not the whole truth. One who is color blind or has no ear for music in the former country is not by simply passing to the other able to appreciate the colors of the Western sunsets and flowers, nor the notes of the mocking-bird. So if under fair conditions one is indifferent to spiritual manifestations and magnetic influences and mental suggestion here, he is not developed enough to largely enjoy the spirit life. He is, as one spirit expressed it, even if of what we call a good character, practically a nobody in that world until he develops his faculties. He has neither capacity of suffering nor enjoying intensely. But the man to be pitied is he who, developed to a large degree, intellectual and sensitive and of strong will, who yet has not learned to honor the laws of social happiness, being ungentle, domineering, rude, tyrannical; trampling upon and shoving ruthlessly aside all who seem to stand in the way to fame or wealth, and whose greatness is built on the weakness of his fellow man. Consistently with such, he also is to be pitied who, led by blind leaders of the blind, has cherished horrible ideas of God and his insatiable vengeance, and of the rigorous exacting and uncompassionate character of exalted spirits or angels. However, the fact that children and common men or women are intensely interested in stories of spirit-manifestations, and even of ghosts and fairies when the redeeming quality of human nature permeates them, when imbued with the milk of human kindness, creates a strong presumption that they are sufficiently advanced to appreciate the spirit life, and that a false theology has cheated them out of their birthright of association with the loved ones "gone before." The presumption is vastly strengthened by considering that people of every class and condition will in confidential moments confess to experiences that clearly indicate spirit interference. They have seen or heard, they have had prophetic intimations in dreams, presentiments, etc.; felt strange magnetic influences such as some refer to as "feeling Jesus" or "the comforter." This proves that common men or women are not wholly incompetent but that they live habitually near the border and occasionally step across or unconsciously open the way for visitors to come back. This also proves that there is nothing essentially abnormal, uncommon or unnatural, in being a medium. "Is Saul among the prophets?"

Paul advised "Desire spiritual gifts, but especially that you may prophesy." The angel of Patmos said "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." But the conventional Christian of to-day often acts as if it read "despise spiritual gifts and particularly the gift of prophecy;" for mediums and especially prophetic clairvoyants are spurned, insulted, driven into conditions that atrophy their powers. They are as sheep among wolves; as a tropical plant trying to bloom in a frosty climate. Yet the question, "how can I become a medium?" is essentially the same as "what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" For the only way to inherit any life is to awaken the consciousness of that life. There is an idea widely accepted that one may reach a high spiritual state without sensible intercourse with spirits, and in the days to come it will seem ridiculous, this affectation of superiority among those who never saw, felt or heard a spirit. You might as well say a babe could grow up to a superior manhood here without becoming conscious of and associating with other human beings. Can one explore Washington without seeing trees, hearing the wind, feeling the rain? No more can one be spiritually advanced (although there may be a good preparation) without associating with spirits.

A distinguished woman writes that she is convinced of the genuineness of spiritual manifestations because of her departed husband manifesting through the organism of a certain "illiterate vulgar medium." But, oh, no! she is not a Spiritualist! They are a low set! Now if she knew the delicate and intimate nature of that "using the medium's organism" she would never have written this, or that her superior husband "used this woman only as an instrument." If there be a perfidious and unholy idea eating like a canker-worm into wholesome Spiritualism, it is this of you and your unsympathetic friends using any sensitive as "only an instrument." "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." The first and last requisite of wholesome mediumship is that the "control" be in good sympathy with the sensitive.

The question is asked and frequently in a supercilious tone: "If spirits can return, why do my friends not come directly to me?" It may be excusable to reply in the Yankee way by asking, Why don't I go to your house? Because you do not invite me, or if you do it is not in the fraternal spirit. You offer conditions that are not acceptable to me. I must meet you in a servile manner or in a way that gives a false impression of my character and purpose. Again we might ask why did Jesus choose the fishermen? Or why did the God of the Bible choose the weak things of this world to confound the wise? Or why don't you catch fish? Because you don't go fishing. Or if you do with elaborate paraphernalia, why does that ragged boy with a bent pin catch a dozen where you could not get a nibble? He had in play qualities you lacked, and gave requisite conditions. "No use to go fishin' 'thout worms."

The first requisite is a degree of sensitiveness, but some who are very sensitive comparatively are not mediumistic for spirits, while some who are not highly sensitive are mediumistic. In this case the more sensitive is too positive. He is engrossed with worldly things. He does not concentrate on the spiritual—has no patience, etc. The rationale of development is that a vessel must be partially or wholly emptied of one liquor before it is in condition to receive another, and so the human mind must be partially or wholly unsatisfied with the physical before it receives the spiritual. A nervous system attuned to coarse influences is not in condition to respond to the finer sensations of the spirit. It must be attuned and the old idea of watching and praying is the important one here. So far as diet, exercise, etc., are concerned they are not unimportant, but the requirements on this line vary with temperament and environ

It is erroneous though to assume that "the natural man is at enmity with God," and while there is sufficient inducement to, as it were, "crucify the flesh with its affections," to empty the vessel of "carnal" things that it may be filled with the spiritual, they will blend and mingle under good conditions as milk will blend with water making a wholesome drink for the weaning child; and except where one is in a very bad condition—"between the devil and the deep sea"—rational development does not sanction a violent breaking of the ties of this world, fighting all desire—"killing all my pretty chickens and their dam at one fell swoop," but mingles the spiritual with the physical, gradually increasing the proportion of the former as capacity increases.

"We build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round."

The tendency has ever been to swing from one extreme to the opposite, and succeeding ages discerned in the great reformer something of the fanatic. Under the Jewish dispensation, while it is clear they entertained the hope of a spirit life, it was given little prominence. The reward of the "godly" was promised in this world—in houses, lands, cattle, wives, children. Christianity was a vigorous reaction. Instead of promising rewards here, the apostle said: "my kingdom is not of this world," and urged the convert to be ready to relinquish all earthly rewards and to rejoice in adversity. Spiritualists fluctuate or differ individually according to temperament and environment. But the philosophy of Spiritualism broadly says there is no enmity between life in the spirit and life in the flesh when lived in accordance with nature. We say then, but only as a general proposition (for under some conditions you must make your choice) "my kingdom is of both worlds."

However, the idea to cherish "aye in your heart of hearts" is that there is in the spiritual what will call for the exercise of all your varied faculties and powers—what will gratify all normal desire—a more intense and engrossing life—what will fill you with interest and with joy far above the best you now know.

The mediumship which truly approaches "fellowship with angels" is the pearl of great price, the "one thing needful." Personally, though not highly sensitized and although for many weary years I fought against those approaches, I will say that not until I opened the way for those celestial visitors did I realize the capacity of enjoyment I possess. There is the difference between the quick and the dead.

"Dawn ran to meet me at the goal—
Oh, day as no tongue can tell again—
And little folk of little soul
Rose up to buy and sell again."

I have also been in Gethsemane and only those who have gone through the fire can understand the nervous strain due largely to erroneous habits, superstitous fears, etc., but also to inimical conditions—to antagonistic influences about me in this world; and every time "after the conflict" I felt to say like Othello:—

If after every tempest come such calms
May the winds roar till they have wakened death,
And may the labouring bark climb hills of seas
Olympus high and duck again as low
As hell's from heaven.

The Philadelphia Jubilee.

To the Editor:—The fact is that so many greetings have poured in upon us, that I am afraid that many of those who contributed to the success of our Jubilee will feel that we are remiss, that I ask you to publish the following resolution adopted at the last official meeting, and presented by a committee comprising every auxiliary society of our association, as well as the president of the N. S. A. who is an honorary member of the First Association. The resolution is as follows, and is intended to respond to the hundreds of greetings received from international, national, state associations, local associations, prominent speakers and mediums, who have made themselves a part of our Jubilee.

A committee was appointed consisting of a representative of each branch of our association and the president of the N. S. A., as an honorary member of our association.

The resolution reads as follows:

We, the officers and trusteees and members of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, recognizing and reciprocating the kindly and fraternal spirit expressed in your greetings to our association, on the occasion of its Golden Jubilee, extend to you our hearty thanks for your appreciative and highly encouraging words. Our Jubilee has been a grand success, and your letter with its words of cheer and encouragement, and hearty good will has done much to give us the signal triumph we have achieved. We have awakened an interest in Spiritualism all over the globe by our Jubilee, and your hearty co-operation has proved to the world that Spiritualists are akin wherever they may dwell. In the name of our grand old association, we thank you for your fraternal greetings and extend to you a most cordial invitation to unite with us in our centennial anniversary fifty years hence. We shall place each greeting in the archives of our association. Wishing you success in all your good work, and thanking you for your tribute to this parent association, we are, in the name of our association, your friends and co-workers, M. E. Cadwallader, chairman, vice-president of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia; A. Groom, conductor of Lyceum and Band of Mercy; Egbert Benner, president Sunflower Club; M. E. Humphries, president Woman's Progressive Union; H. D. Barrett, president N. S. A., and honorary member of the First Association of Philadelphia, committee.

WHEN THE SHADOWS FALL.

When the twilight shadows fall,
And my daily cares are o'er,
Smiling faces I recall,
And the happy days of yore;
When my youth was but a dream
Floating swiftly on life's tide
Lightly as the bright sunbeam
Tints the ripples as they glide.

Years have passed, and in their train
Joys and sorrows I have met,
Happy smiles and tears of pain,
Pleasing thoughts and vain regret;
Loving friends have left my sight,
Safe within the mystic veil,
Living in a realm of light
Guarded by a phantom pale.

When I sit amidst the gloom,
Musing on the days of yore,
Silent people fill the room
From the ever vernal shore;
I can feel the subtile touch
Of pure lips upon my face,
And I vainly try to clutch
Spirit forms of perfect grace.

Noiseless as fair Luna's light
Steals within the window pane,
Spirit forms and faces bright
Come to visit friends again;
They are always at our side,
Guarding us from earthly ill;
Forms of clay are laid aside
But the spirit's with us still.

HENRY M. EDMISTON.

IS RELIGION DECLINING?

The Naked Truth, by Rev. Thomas B. Gregory, in the Chicago American.

The Rev. G. Campbell Morgan says religion is declining. But the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan is not necessarily correct in his pessimistic pronouncement.

In attempting to settle the question it would be well, first of all, to define the term at issue.

What, then, IS religion? To begin with, it is not theology. There is as much difference between religion and theology as there is between the harp and the music that is evoked from its chords. Religion is a sentiment; theology is a dogma. Religion belongs to the spirit, theology to the letter. Religion is the instinctive motion of the heart; theology is the carefully formulated logic of the head.

When a man FEELS that he is the child of God, loved by Him, cared for by him, and that because he is God's child he is destined to live forever, he is religious; but when, not stopping with this feeling, he goes on to argue about the matter, and, arguing, finally formulates his thinking into hard and fast propositions about God and life and death, he becomes theological.

It is possible for a man to be thoroughly religious without having any particular theology, just as it is possible for him to have any amount of theology without having a particle of religion. The one, it may be well to repeat, is a sentiment, the other a clearly defined creed.

Now, there can be no sort of doubt about the propositions that THEOLOGY is on the decline. One can see the evidences of it on every side. The creeds are breaking up as icebergs break up when, drifting from the frozen North, they come in contact with the warmer waters of the Gulf Stream. Dogmatic Christianity is losing its hold upon the intellectual affection and moral good will of the great majority of thinking, reflecting people.

The preachers are unable to gain a larger or an earnest hearing for the ecclesiastical dogmas with which they once swayed the world. People are tiring of them. They do not believe in them. They will not listen to them.

The great preachers of to-day—men like Gunsaulus, Washington Gladden and T. T. Munger—hold their large and interested congregations, not by preaching about dogmas and creeds, but by preaching about duty and character, about life and how best to live it.

In other words, these great men give theology a grand letting alone and devote their splendid powers to showing the beauty of holiness and the blessedness that comes of devotion to high ethical and spiritual ideals.

And these last words remind me of the very patent fact that never before did the race have such fine ethical and spiritual ideals as it has to-day.

The race is better prepared than ever it was to appreciate moral and spiritual values—to understand, let us say, the beautiful character of Jesus and all such as are similar to him in spirit and purpose.

In fine, while theology is undoubtedly declining, and while creed and dogma are rapidly losing their hold upon the mind of the world, religion—the sentiment, the instinct, the silent leaning of the soul toward hope and trust in the beauty and goodness of life and its concerns—is growing stronger every day.

In the best and highest sense of the word men are more religious right here in this America of ours, and right now in this year of grace, nineteen hundred and two, than they ever were at any previous period of history.

In the ages of "Faith," when dogmatism ruled the world without a rival, and when the creeds were universally believed, there did not begin to be the true religion in this world that there is to-day. Men were coarse, largely brutal, unmindful of the worth of human life, careless of the fine ethical harmonies of each other's hearts and souls.

There was plenty of theology, but there was but little religion; plenty of dry formulas, but a wonderful scarcity of the finer feelings, such as the sense of justice, the perception of human worth, the sentiment of brother love, and the feeling, vague but real and powerful, that somehow all things are being shaped in accordance with our highest and noblest dreams.

The world is not losing its reverence; it is only losing its respect for the superstitions in which it once honestly but ignorantly believed, very much to its intellectual and moral hurt.

Instead of losing its reverence the world is daily adding to its store of the same; and it is simply because this is so, because men have not less reverence, but more, that they are discarding the theology of the olden days.

Men are wiser in these days than ever they were before, and not only wiser, but better, and out of the newer and finer humanity there is growing the appreciation of moral and spiritual tenets which will no longer believe the ancient dogmas.

There is no cause for pessimism in this. It means not the decline of religion, but only the decline of the theology which is true religion's worst enemy.

LOVE AND FAITH.

Dowie and the Prayer Cure.

The spectacle of the faith healer rising from the bedside of his stricken daughter and sending for a physician to heal his child is furnishing more ammunition to the enemies of Zion in their task of showing Dowie's deluded followers the impotence of their sawdust idol.

To my mind this new criticism of faith healing is neither logical nor humane. Legitimate arguments of all kinds have done service to the race in destroying the superstitions of the human mind, but Dr. Dowie's detractors might well have waited until his child had been laid in the grave before criticising the man and the father for placing his love above his faith.

I know nothing of Dowie except what I hear and read, and therefore I know nothing of Dowie. But for infinite ages nature has decreed that parents must love their children, love them even more than their own lives, or children could not come upon the earth. Whatever the errors and absurdities of Dowie's faith—and there are many, for in its vital points it is the faith of all Christianity, of all revealed religion—still, whatever its errors or absurdities, he is a father, with a father's feelings and a father's love.

The world seems to think that, because Dowie does not believe in doctors and does believe in prayer, he should have looked calmly upon his child writhing on a bed of anguish and clung to his philosophy and smothered the human feelings in his breast.

We all reason and philosophize about the great, terrible specter of death, and yet in its presence, or in the shadow of its near approach, all philosophies are shattered and all religions crumble into dust. Nothing in his life has given me the same respect for Dowie as the fact that he rose from his prayers and sent for a doctor to help his child. This does not prove that he doubts the faith he teaches, or still less that the faith is not founded on the rock. It simply shows that deeper and more abiding than his faith lies the everlasting human, tender feelings upon which all life endures.

It has been my fortune, like most of those who have reached middle life, to witness many deathbed scenes. In the last moments the most unbelieving of the family and friends may turn from their doctor to their forgotten God, and the most devout from their ever-present God to the physician who in their saner moments they would not trust. When the human heart once feels that one who is fondly loved is about to become a piece of lifeless clay there is no specter of hope, however wild and elusive, that will not be frantically and fondly grasped by the tottering mind.

The philosophies of men, if tested by their conduct, must be judged by their normal life, not in the moments of their anguish, their delirium or their sore travail.

Dr. Dowie as a physician cannot be tested by his conduct beside his dying child. It is much safer and fairer to test him by some one less near and dear. Neither the father's prayers nor the physician's skill could save this child; thus as a test of the relative merits of doctors and prayers the death of Dowie's child leaves the controversy where it was.

In two recent notable instances the world has witnessed a prayer test, not by faith curists or freaks, but by the reasoning, thinking, censuring world. In the cases of Garfield and McKinley the whole Christian world turned from the doctors to their God. In both cases their God did not hear their prayers, but this will not prevent their turning again and again to the same real or imaginary source when the dread presence comes near to some one dearly loved.

The feeling of dependence on a supreme power is very old in the human race; it is inherent in every fiber of the being of man, and, though our philosophy may deny, still when through age or weakness or calamity we revert to the primal man the old, old feeling comes again.

So long as men will pray for rain, for the health of rulers or the lives of those who are near and dear they have no right to censure Dowie or his kind for believing more than they or having a stronger faith than theirs. And likewise, too, the doctor is a superstition, or a fact, as the case may be, almost as old and primal, and man in moments of anguish will turn to him.

Doubtless Dr. Dowie, looking at the stricken face of his child, would have implored a soothsayer or even a snake charmer to touch her garment in the vain hope that this might relieve her misery and save her life.

The arguments that shall prevail against Dowie and all other fanatics must not be such as to shock the reason or the common humanities that make up what is best in man.—Clarence S. Darrow in Chicago American.

A BIRTHDAY.

Eleven years old to-day, darling,
And only a pictured face,
That heeds not the rain of my tears,
Nor feels my loving embrace.

Eleven years old to-day, darling,
How I think of the precious years
When all my thought was of you, dear,
My plans, my hopes and my fears.

Eleven years old to-day, darling,
And I hold only a curl of your hair,
No little fair head on my bosom,
No lightsome feet on the stair.

Eleven years old to-day, darling,
Your dollie sits in her chair
And seems to wonder the little mother
Doesn't take her out for the air.

Eleven years old to-day, darling,
Do the angels know you're eleven?
And are they keeping your birthday
In some beautiful home in heaven?

THE PACIFIC COAST.

News and Notes from California.

The interest of the week here, centers in the eruptions of the West Indian volcanoes. While we shudder with horror at the incidents so minutely portrayed by the pen and pencil of the mighty "press gang," we are also questioning: "What next? Does the line of seismatic disturbance run across our state?" It is a long time since old Mother Earth addressed our unheeding ears, with her volcanic speaking trumpet.

Truly, this time, the astrologers have had their predictions verified. Uranus, Saturn and all the other malific and discordant planets are executing a curious fandango upon this little planet of ours. It resembles the attack of a lot of big bullies upon a young and tender thing that does not know where he is at, for the greater part of the time.

It is to be observed, however, that the disturbances are to a great extent along the physical plane. In it, through it and in a measure acting as a sedative moves the spiritual thought of the race, rising to the thought of heroism, in exposure of one's self, if thereby some poor, smitten wretch may yet a little longer enjoy life. The outpouring of compassion and mercy is demonstrated by the prompt shipment of supplies from allwheres toward the crucial center. It also proves how much the average of the race has improved in its desire to be guided by the spirit. It does not matter that those to whom we listen, because they are wise men, assert that the Twentieth Century has opened with a mediocre race in the saddle.

It is the united force of common men who have records of endurance, and unsurpassed accomplishment, which the hero, working single-handed finds it impossible to put into monumental form. The masses are refusing to act as "them asses," of mere physical impulse. It is a faint glimpse of the Unity of All. The true co-operation is revealed to us. Is the lesson worth the cost? From the spirit point of view, yes. From the disgruntled physical, a doubtful negative.

An unsolved question is whether Napoleon, or any of the masters of physical evolvement, left the world any better than they found it, or even as much improved, as the resultant of their living in it or of what they did while here. On the other hand, we do know that the spirit power was awakened to be discerned, by the lives and teachings of Zoroaster, Buddha, and Jesus of Nazareth. This is true of any good man with strong mentality, and wisdom to speak the words of knowledge. They have made the whole world better and more habitable, through the spirit power issuing from them.

In strong contrast to the teaching of himself and his sect is the comment of the press, on the passing of that religious comedian, Dr. DeWitt Talmage, who, they say, "cleaned up $300,000 while preaching a free gospel to the poor." Perhaps some of his parishioners were stock brokers.

We hear that Capt. Geo. W. Walrond, of Denver, Colo., so long known for his Spiritualistic work, may come to the Pacific coast in search of health and renewed strength. He may be sure of a warm welcome from his many friends and acquaintances.

We notice in print, an account of a christening held at some social gathering of Spiritualists. It struck us as incongruous, to say the least. What could be the object of such a ceremony with us. In the great Roman and Episcopal churches, it is the first step toward the crushing burden of sectarianism: the first application of the branding iron that is to indicate future ownership. But what have Spiritualists in common with that. They have broken chain after chain and are now standing face to face with their last enemy, death, with the promise that they shall overcome that also. Is it not best for us to put aside all of the old burdens possible? Do not forget that words of obligation either bind or constitute the speaker a perjurer. It is not our business to decide such a question, even if we had a desire so to do. I am simply stating the case from my point of view.

Miss Sarah J. Farmer, the founder and successful manager of the Greenacre Summer School, at Eliot, Maine, was in San Francisco, for a few days, last week. Notwithstanding the strain of the last few years she looks as young and handsome as when she, receiving her grandfather's dream of progress, pledged herself and all her means to its realization. She told me that the school session had never been more brilliant or successful than last summer. She is anticipating still more for this season. We can advise, from personal experience, that those who are planning an outing, can do no better thing than to make Greenacre a station of their summer itinerary.

Grateful Acknowledgment.

To all Spiritualists of Chicago, who assisted and participated in the grand entertainment recently given in Chicago, greeting:

The N. S. A. gratefully acknowledges its debt to you one and all, and thanks each one for the generous sum rounded out from that occasion, of $88.75, also two 50-cent pieces of U. S. script, to be sold if possible, at a premium, this entire amount of $89.75 to be devoted to the Mediums' Home at Reed City, Mich.

The National Spiritualists Association is doing its best to enhance the good work of our cause, and to aid all worthy mediums it can, who are sick and destitute. The reception of this magnificent sum from the fruits of your labors and sympathy in the worthy object mentioned, is a great encouragement for us to travel on in the line marked out for the completing and opening of a home of comfort for worn-out mediums.

We thank you, one and all, with the deep sense of spiritual and mental gratitude. Cordially yours,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

SPIRIT MANIFESTATION.

A Gentleman Relates His Experience.

Through the medium of the press, both spiritual and secular, wonderful accounts of occult or spirit manifestations are chronicled almost daily and heralded throughout the land. By some writers not familiar with the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism they are called very mysterious and beyond their power of understanding and explanation, while upon the other hand the student in the ranks of Spiritualism knows that they are results of natural law and certain conditions. Others who claim to be the mouthpiece of God tell their congregations they are the works of the devil and to have nothing to do with them. The facts in the case, however, are quite the reverse, Spiritualists well know. They also understand the source from which they emanate. The bands of workers on the spirit side of life—I say workers, since there are workers and drones there as well as here—are determined to lift the denizens of this world out of creedal bondage and darkness into spiritual light and freedom, a light that will give them a better understanding of life here and hereafter. It also teaches how to live while we are here to prepare one for the next world into which we are daily drifting and to which we sooner or later must go.

I would like to relate a few experiences of a gentleman who has resided in Canton for a number of years. This gentleman being well acquainted with and on intimate terms with the writer, also knowing him to be a Spiritualist who does not hide his light under a bushel, he related the following story with the understanding that if I made use of it his name would not be used. Said he: "Several years ago I lost by death my wife, and since her death she at various times has come to me, and I have seen her as plainly as I ever saw her while she was my dear companion. She comes mostly when I am alone and always when I am in trouble and unable to meet, as I would like, some of the obligations of this life. Each and every time she was dressed in a lovely white robe and when I follow her advice I invariably come out all right.

"While on a trip into Pennsylvania I went over to Philadelphia to visit a friend. I had the name of the street upon which he lived, but had forgotten the number of his house. Arriving in the city in the evening I took a street car and at once started for his home but upon leaving the car at the street upon which he lived I was confused and unable to decide which way to go, to the right or to the left, and while standing there I called first upon God and then Maggie, my dead wife, to guide me to the home of my friend, and almost instantly a white-robed figure, which proved to be Maggie, sprang up in front of me, then beckoned me to follow it, and after leading me up to the door of my friend's residence it vanished as quickly as it came.

"While in Pittsburg I had a similar experience, but the most mysterious as well as the most comforting experience I have had was on a cold winter night a few years ago. I had some business in a small town located down in Pennsylvania, several miles from any railroad, and the nearest railroad station to the town I wished to reach had but a few buildings. Arriving there in the evening and being unable to procure a conveyance, I started afoot, and after I had gone a few miles I came to a cross-roads, and forgetting directions given me, I was in a quandary to decide which way to turn, but my worry was of short duration, since Maggie, my guardian angel, came suddenly into the road, floating in mid-air just above the ground, and beckoned me to follow her. After going a short distance she vanished, to reappear at the next turning point. At last I reached my destination, but before doing so she waved a farewell greeting and disappeared."

"Have you had any of those so-called mysterious experiences in Canton, and of recent date?"

"Oh, yes; many a time, one of which may be worth relating. I not long since disposed of my property with the understanding that I vacate it on or before a certain date. After looking several days for a house and finding them scarce and hard to get, as you no doubt are aware, I became somewhat discouraged and as a result that evening after going to bed and while meditating over the matter Maggie came to me and told me that the first man that I would meet in the morning and while on my road up town had a house for rent and would rent it to me. The first man I met was Mr. W——. I was correctly informed and am now living in a house belonging to him.

"Mr. Kidd, if that apparition or whatever you may call it was not the spirit of Maggie clothed in her heavenly garments, I would like to have you or some one to tell me what it was that on those occasions guided me safely to my destination and in many other ways has assisted me."

I assured the gentleman that it was a guardian spirit and without question his devoted wife who is watching over him day and night, and that when his time comes to pass to the spirit side of life that she, with other loved ones, will be waiting for and ready to receive him.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

LETTER NUMBER FIFTEEN.

I know it must sound very strange to the people of earth when they are told about lying upon the grass in heaven; and really it would have sounded quite strange to me when there; and yet it did not sound very strange to you and me when we were told about entering gates of pearl, and walking streets paved with gold, the golden crowns, harps and white robes, together with the rest of the story. But I find the grass much more beautiful and restful than hard golden streets would be. I know that my head would ache if it were obliged to carry forever a heavy crown of gold, my soft hair is much more becoming and graceful, and I am not obliged, even, to wear a straw or panama hat, although I liked the panama and often wore one when in the form.

Now I do not like that expression—when in the form—for I am in a form now just as much as I ever was, and the form that I have now is the identical form that filled my mortal body—the very same form and no other. When I was in the perishable part of my body, my hair appeared thin and mixed with grey; but the imperishable hair was never thin or grey, and thus of every wrinkle or blemish or mark of age, which simply means marks of decay—the decaying of the mortal—the spirit robs the mortal to add to its own beauty. When the mortal hair is grey, the spiritual hair is correspondingly more shining, soft and beautiful, and more decided and bright in color. As the mortal body loses its symmetrical proportions, the spirit body becomes more and more symmetrical. Now as it is with the human, mortal body, so it is with all material things and that is why I am able to lie on beautiful, velvety grass, instead of walking tiresome streets of gold; that is better than the heavy golden crown; besides, I never did like being shut up anywhere, and I should grow restless even if I were shut in by gates of pearl. Why, the earth itself was scarcely large enough for me. I used to become exceedingly restless and ever had a strong desire to move on. Well, when last I moved on I moved out. I left that hindering thing, the mortal part, behind. If you could all realize that so-called death is simply moving out, you would be much happier and more contented to stay in the old house until it became uninhabitable, then your new house would seem brighter and more beautiful than it otherwise would.

Now I shall ask you all if green grass is not more natural than streets of gold and much more reasonable; if trees are not much better than a great white throne and far more graceful and beautiful; if singing birds are not better than golden harps? I know that you, Spiritualists, will say: Mr. Denton, you need not trouble yourself to tell us that heaven is not as we once thought it to be. We now look upon such thoughts as old superstitions.

My friends, if all the world were Spiritualists, then it would not be necessary; if all the world had progressed out of superstition, then it would be useless; but such is not the case; the larger half of the world still believe in the pearly gates, the streets of gold, the crowns, harps and so forth; that is why I write as I do.

Do your Catholic priests tell you of a heaven where grass grows green and trees are tall and stately; where the waters sparkle and the brooks babble; do your Baptists, Methodists, and all other orthodox preachers tell you of singing birds, of lovely cottages and stately homes, of halls of learning and temples of wisdom, together with schools for young men and maidens and little children? No; they tell you of none of these things. Now it is not to teach those who know, that I come; but to tell those who don't know. The wise need me not. Let them become teachers to the unwise. I never could think of the orthodox heaven, when a child, without horror. Children suffer tortures in thinking of heaven and hell and many a poor little child's life has been spoiled thereby.

As a boy I suffered much with headache, and I now know that it was caused solely from hard thinking—thinking about those golden streets, the great white throne, the awful God seated thereon whom I never could be induced to love; the shining, cold, white, stately angels, all marching with golden crowns and harps, praising, praising, praising God forevermore; and, then, as I tried to grasp it all, my poor little head would ache. Grasping my head tightly with my hands, and with starting eyeballs, I would cry out: "O! I don't want to go to heaven—I don't want to!" Then my mind would turn and say: "If you don't go to heaven, you must go to hell;" and, here again, what an awful picture for the tender, sensitive child. It is a wonder that they do not all become crazed or idiotic, for the little child believes implicitly what you tell it. A hell of fire and brimstone with a horrible, wicked, cruel devil who has a terrible face and a horn growing out of his forehead, a long tail and a cloven hoof, a pitchfork in his hands with which to prod and pitch the little child into the raging fire. O! it was awful—awful indeed for my poor, little, childish brain; and my mind would oscillate from one picture to the other in wild despair, until, at last, the natural sleep of boyhood would come to my relief and my poor, tired, childish brain would rest among green trees, bright flowers, singing birds, butterflies, babbling brooks, and so on. But for this rest my reason would have been dethroned and I should have become a raging maniac.

O! I implore—I beg of you, do not teach your children such falsehoods, such terrible lies, but tell the little child, if you must tell it anything at all about death, that the world to which its dead playmate, or little brother or sister has gone, is a beautiful world, filled with all the natural things that little children love, for this is true and not the other. The little girl will have her doll and her kitten, her playhouse and lovely little children to play with, books and pictures, and all manner of childish toys. When she walks forth, she will see bright flowers, beautiful fountains, green grass, stately trees, singing birds, prancing horses, dogs and other animals. And so with the boy; tell him that he will have all that boys love best, that is, all that is good. He can play in the sand, build boats, fly kites, swim in a river or pond, ride a pony, have his little go-carts and bicycles if he likes, his dog also, if he is good to it, as he surely will be when he understands that the dog or horse is as sensitive to a hurt as himself. Tell your children these things and make them happy. My greatest wish is that no child shall ever endure what I did when a boy. And it took years to eradicate such false teachings from my mind, and even as a man, its effects still clung about me.

SPIRIT WILLIAM DENTON.

LETTER NUMBER SIXTEEN.

I am well aware that many who read these letters will say that William Denton had nothing to do with them; but I beg to inform such that they are greatly mistaken; that I, William Denton, have all and everything to do with them; that I hold the sensitive under full control and write as I will; otherwise I would not write at all.

Why should I not write these letters? Can anyone answer me that question? There is no desire that may not be granted to an earnest and sincere soul. If other spirits can control and write through mediums, why should not I be able to do so? I do not want to be denied that privilege and I would like to be accepted and believed.

Many will say, Mr. Denton, if it is really you who are writing, can't you give us some test? Yes, I think I can give you some tests, but what would be a test to one would not be so to another, consequently, in order to give tests, I should be obliged to meet each person separately, and as these letters are designed for all collectively, it is impossible to select each individually for the purpose of giving each a test. I would far rather give you something of more importance than simply tests. I would like to impress my personality so strongly within these messages, that all who ever met me or heard me speak, or have read any of my former lectures and rhymes, cannot fail to recognize me at once.

Yes, I want to talk with you all face to face, soul to soul. It is better to believe me than to doubt me, for I shall not lead you astray or tell you untruths. I was a sincere and earnest worker on earth, I am a sincere and earnest worker here. I suppose if I were to give you a long geological dissertation, many would put more faith in my letters; but I am not now as deeply interested in geology as I am in the immortal soul of man. I would rather work in conjunction with other spiritual beings for the welfare of mankind, than to delve in crude matter, or search down through the earth's crust for its various strata, and the periods of time it took to form them. Really, it now seems quite unimportant to me, compared with the work I have set myself to do.

As before stated in these letters, when with you in the form I had a great desire to put out the fires of hell and kill the devil, and I did my utmost to accomplish it.

Now, I want to destroy nunneries and liberate the nuns, all of them, both on earth and here in the spheres. I want to break down a celibate priesthood. If you of earth were here with us in the spheres and could know of the untold anguish and suffering of both nuns and priests, you would not ask why we desired to do so. Although priests suffer together with the nuns, the most bitter anguish rests with the sisterhood, cloistered as they are beyond all human sympathy, abject slaves to a libidinous priesthood and the tyrannical rule of the abbess.

Now we do not say that all priests and nuns are to be classed in this category, but the larger part of them, especially in the foreign lands and islands somewhat remote, where friars and priests hold full sway. The nunneries in America—both North and South America—will soon be inspected, and if the inspectors are not bribed, and insist on doing their full duty, horrors never even dreamed of will be exposed to the light of day. Wretched women will be found confined in dungeons, mere skeletons, wallowing in filth and vermin with rats, mice and spiders for companions. The countenances of these poor females will be found frightful to look upon, the expression of a human being nearly obliterated; sunken eyes looking out from inflamed sockets; cheek bones nearly protruding through the skin and sometimes entirely so; hair uncombed for years and matted with vermin; hands like claws, with some of the nails—that have not been broken off in their frantic clawing—long and sharp like the claws of an eagle. These poor creatures are being punished thus for some fancied sin, the sins being mostly those of resistance to the priests, or so-called impertinence to the abbess. If they exercise the slightest will of their own in anything, they are severely punished, and often confined in the dungeons for years. Skeletons will be found, where these poor creatures have been walled up alive, dying a horrible lingering death. O God! My God! Can I be engaged in a greater work than trying to break down this infernal system of cloistering females in nunneries and compelling priests to remain unmarried? Why it should be considered sinful for priests to marry passes comprehension. It is far more unnatural and sinful to remain unmarried than to marry. Anything that is unnatural is sinful, or leads to unnatural wrongs. No man or woman can break a natural law with impunity. If that law is broken it will turn and rend the one who breaks it; but the law is blind, it rends with equal force the ones who are compelled to break it; consequently the poor nuns are punished for breaking natural laws which they supposed in their innocence and ignorance to be the way to gain the favor of God, and a sure passport to enter the gates of eternal bliss. Poor, misguided creatures; as though to break the eternal natural laws of God was the way to gain his eternal favor?

Now the fiat has gone forth in the heavenly spheres, that nunneries shall be abolished, and millions upon millions of progressed spirits have set themselves to the task of breaking them down. No matter how much the Romish Church may fight against it, down they will go as sure as that the worlds move in space.

The spiritual world was determined that the black man should go free; and, although much human blood was shed, the work was accomplished. The spiritual world is determined that nunneries shall be abolished, and, although much human blood may be shed, the work shall and will be accomplished.

We cannot now tell you just how long it may be before this will be brought to pass, but not very long.

Abraham Lincoln was raised up by the spiritual world, that he might free the black slave; another as good as he will be raised up to free the tens of thousands of nuns from their living death. So long as slavery of any kind exists, wars will be. Truth and Justice cannot walk the earth so long as some are in bondage.

There is scarcely a nunnery in the earthly world, and we may say there is not one, where some poor nun—and in many cases two, three, or four—is not confined in a dark cell, a little straw thrown in one corner, and she is fed on scraps, often mouldy and unclean, a little dry bread and water. This is continued for months, or even years, until the will of the nun is completely broken down; and even some who have given no offense whatever are thus incarcerated, simply as an object lesson to the others, so that they may not dare to oppose those in authority. Many nuns die while they are thus confined, but others last many years. There is not on your earth to-day such awful suffering as can be found in the nunneries. Rise up, O my people, and right this fearful wrong. The angel world is with you and truth and right shall surely conquer at last. Vote only for those who will insist that the nunneries shall be inspected, that no prisons of any kind shall exist on the earth that shall not be subject to inspection. No body of men whatever have a right to close and bar doors and windows on any human being unless it be a criminal convicted and sentenced to prison; and yet your jails, penitentiaries, and prisons, are all subject to inspection; then why should the Romish church be allowed to build convents and nunneries that are not subject to inspection?

One may say that nuns enter these institutions of their own free will. This is not often the case, however. Sometimes they are forced to take the veil by relatives; sometimes they are inveigled into it by priests and other interested parties, but in no case do they know what a dreadful fate awaits them; they are wholly and entirely deceived; they are nearly all very young and in experienced in the ways of the wicked; they are filled with religious enthusiasm; they are innocent, trusting, and affectionate, and often courageous and daring, else they would not take such a step in the dark, and when once this step is taken there is no retreat; they are dead to their relatives and those who, if they knew, might help them, and to all the world. There is now no escape. How many of these poor creatures, when, at last, their eyes are opened, go nearly or quite insane. There are others who yield more readily to their fate, finding no escape but in the dungeon or death. How long shall this state of things exist in so-called free America? How long shall they exist in other lands? When once the nunneries are abolished the Romish church will have lost its right arm and then, gradually, it shall be dismembered. After the nunneries are abolished there shall be a law passed that no person shall remain unwed by compulsion. All men and women, no matter how their religion may teach to the contrary, shall be free to wed, if they wish to. Thus the left arm shall go. No man shall be allowed to take a position where he is supposed to be authorized by God himself to stand in God's stead to the people. Thus the head will be surrendered. When hell and Satan are destroyed the limbs will go; the trunk, which contains the breath and the throbbing heart, is the whole mass of the people, and they will scatter and take up more rational views. Thus the Scarlet Woman of Babylon will, at last, fall to rise no more. Help to hasten the day—O, my soul!

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE LIGHT OF THE EAST, CALCUTTA, INDIA.

MATERIALIZATION IN INDIA.

A correspondent of the Amrita Bazar Patrika writes to a contemporary as follows: I have already sent you a description of a wonderful performance given by a Mahomedan of the 24 Perganas connected with ghostology. Here are the particulars of another performance of a startling character, as related by an eye-witness, Lala R. C. Kapur, son of Lala A. C. Kapur and nephew of Raja But-Behari Kapur Saheb. It was held in the house of a respectable zemindar and witnessed by a pretty large assembly of intelligent and cultured gentlemen.

The party assembled at about 1:30 a. m. in a solitary room of the house of the late Bholrab Babu, which was detached from any others in which there might be any idol or any object of divine worship or even pictures of Hindu gods and goddesses. All the windows and doors were carefully secured from within. As the room contained more doors than one, the Oja asked the gentlemen through which door they should want the spirit to enter in. And particular door being pointed to a wooden plank with a few arecanuts on and overspread with a clean piece of cloth was placed in the inside front of it for the invoked spirit to sit upon. Two gentlemen of the party, who had no faith whatever in ghostology, seated themselves one on each side and with vigilant minds, just close to the door bolted, of course with more than ordinary care. The Oja in the meantime burnt a substance like incense and when cooled, deposited the ashes in the hollow of the palm of his left hand. He then got himself seated in a recumbent posture about five yards away from the particular door with his back turned towards it, and allowed his right hand to be bound by a rope to facilitate detection of movement on his part and the rope was held tight by a gentleman of the party, with extreme watchfulness.

After these preliminaries were gone through, the man placed his right hand upon his left, changed his recumbent posture gradually and, with extreme seriousness laid himself down to the ground upon his breast with his face on his hands and went on uttering audibly a world of mantras. A lamp was burning in the room in front of the man which was to be put out the moment the spirit gave indications of his appearance. Outside the room a number of men sat just close to the door by which the spirit was to enter in to catch a glimpse of him or his shadow, if possible.

At this stage everybody remained perfectly silent for some time, while the Oja went on muttering the mantra without the least cessation and with great volubility, when the sound of some heavy treads was clearly heard overhead on the roof of the room. Taking this to be the advent of the spirit, the lamp in the room was immediately put out. There was general perturbation in the room and everyone held breath in anxious suspense not unmingled with a sense of awe; but the spirit did not make his appearance. Thereupon the lamp was lit again and the Oja asked for three brickbats to be brought to him. These were soon supplied and the man having besmeared them with the ashes in his left hand, wanted anyone of the party to fling them in three different directions with as much force as possible. This done, the man went on with his work of uttering the mantras with redoubled energy.

After a little while, a similar sound of heavy steps was again heard on the roof and, ere long one sharp sound was heard on the door in front of which the plank was provided. And O! Suddenthe bolted door flew wide open to the immense astonishment of all, especially of the two who were just close to it, the narrator being one of them. And from a cracking sound proceeding from the wooden plank, the party was given to understand that the spirit had taken his seat.

The very first question that the spirit put was, "Where is my mother's due," (meaning mother Kali) and immediately a sum of Rs. 1-4 was placed on the plank according to a previous suggestion of the Oja. Then the spirit complained that there was such a crowd outside on the doorstep that it was very inconvenient for him to enter in and the men there were, therefore, asked to recede a little. The spirit then made some miraculous revelations. Asked by a gentleman to tell his thoughts, the spirit said: "I know your wife suffers from a severe pain in the abdomen when big with child," which was exactly the thought uppermost in the gentleman's mind. Similarly requested, the spirit answered to a second gentleman, "Yes, the madooli may do her good for a couple of years, but beyond that nothing is expected to be of any avail to your aunt." In answer to a third he said, "I see you mean to ask me about your gold ring that was stolen the other day; well, that is in your wife's box," etc. The spirit made many more startling revelations, spoke with a clear voice, though with a nasal twang. "Hazra," for that was the name of his spirit, was now allowed to go and he vanished away banging the doors behind him which was kept closed all this time, after his entrance into the room.

After a while, and the same preliminaries had been gone through, another spirit was brought named "Shamsher." This Mohamedan spirit was a jolly good fellow and gave the party a delightful song, beating time on the plank all the while to the great amusement of all.

Lastly, a female spirit named "Kamini" was ushered into the room but was soon dismissed because her tongue was not at all a polished one, for just on her entrance she treated the gentlemen present with her choicest Billingsgate for having caused her to leave her comfortable Sanctum Sanctorum, moreover, she would make no bones of traversing the forbidden ground of female secrecy.

Thus ended the wonderful performance which lasted for two hours. The Oja, who all along lay with his face on the ground and exactly in the same posture, now got up, and looked so much knocked down as if he had wrestled with the ghosts for these two hours with all his might and main. Everybody was perfectly well-satisfied with this wonderful performance and the Oja was rewarded with a sum of Rs. 60.

FIRE WALKERS IN MANY LANDS.

It seems that the ceremony of fire-walking which is occasionally practiced in India, and which is such an interesting phenomenon to Westerners especially, is by no means unknown in various other countries. It is now believed to have been practiced by the Fiji Islanders, from time immemorial, and has been witnessed and reported by English people of undoubted veracity. It is common in Japan as will be noted later on; but the most recent report comes from Honolulu. In January last, a Tahitian Kahuna walked four times over the hot stones, "the fierce, red glow attesting to the heated condition of their underside." According to an account in Theosophy in Australasia, "He in a loose white wrapper, guarded at the waist with a rope of leaves, a crown of which he also had on his head, and held in his hand a bunch of them, with which he thrashed the earth twice such time before passing over the heated stones, at the same time inwardly invoking the fire spirits and praying to 'Cina Niu, the Ahara, Vahine Niu, Itee Ahurai, the God, Goddess and Spirits.' Following is the concluding common: "This shows that the old Polynesian sorcerers did possess mysterious magical powers and secrets, carefully handed over through initiations and which were evidently remains of the great magical knowledge of Atlantians."

More than a year ago there appeared in the Wide World magazine an article which described in detail one of these thrilling performances, and the elaborate preparatory rites enacted by the priest, and was illustrated with fourteen photographs—making the whole description seem wonderfully real. We have space for one or two extracts from this account.

The bed of charcoal was 18 feet long by 5 or 6 feed wide and "was a glowing red-hot mass" and the heat nearly scorched the spectators who stood a little way off. The court-yard was densely packed with Japanese, Europeans and Americans.

One by one the ascetics assembled, all dressed in a single white cotton kimono. At last one of them stood at the head of the fierce and glowing furnace, his head bowed in prayer, and holding high in both hands an offering to the god to whose power they attributed the casting out of the spirit (heat) of the fire so that they were enabled to pass over unhurt. A silence fell on all. The watchers or spectators, whether skeptical, curious or wondering, were breathless.

A movement—the man strode forward—step upon step over the 18 feet of glowing, scorching fire. Not gingerly or timidly, mind you, did he tread, but with well-planted, firm and fearless feet—thus did he pass over. Not even the smell of burning reached our expectant nostrils, though his flimsy white gown was down to his ankles. Another followed, making a well-worn path across that marvelous road of fire. The ascetics, or treats, went over several times, and then called out that they had tried the fire—that it had no power to burn, and anyone who liked might now pass over. Then a strange thing happened. The Japanese men, women and children around me went down and walked over, unhurt. A continuous stream passed over the dull furnace. Their clothes were unsinged and their feet unhurt, for I myself, with some of my friends, went to examine them afterwards. Some begged me to try, telling me that the fire would make my feet very strong and my "feelings would become good" (i. e., comfortable), were I to do so. Alas! I had neither their faith nor their simplicity, and so I did not turn fire-walker.

The scene was a remarkable and impressive one; however, the fire-walking may be accounted for.

Curiosity prompted me two days after to visit the temple and ask the high priest for an interview. I told him how struck I had been with what I had seen, and asked if he could explain what appeared a miracle?

"To you," he said, "and to the ordinary spectator it seems an impossible thing, and you try to account for it by assuming some vulgar trick or conjuring, but to me it is not strange. We of the shinshukyo sect believe in our god, and by invoking him we are enabled to pour boiling water over our bodies, to walk over fire, and to mount sword-blades without sustaining any harm."

"But," I said, "are you or your disciples able at any time to walk on fire without being hurt?"

"No," he said, "it is only after long prayer and invocation that we can do so and the goyja (ascetic) must try it before an ordinary believer, to find out if the power has been drawn out of the fire.

"My disciples never eat meat, or fish—never drink any stimulant of any kind, either wine or coffee or tea, nor do they even think of strong-smelling vegetables such as tonic or garlic; and we only eat twice a day—in the morning and evening. We must be clean in heart and body, or we should be burned."

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

MOVING AHEAD.

One of the most remarkable of present-day phenomena is the drift toward the recognition of another life than this, the moving away from that gross materialism which had many adherents, and which was of the rigid, "one-life-at-a-time" type.

Yet, even in the midst of the most depressing time of materialism, there were those among its greatest stalwarts who, while urging attention of "this life," found time to speculate concerning the possibility of "life in another world."

Bradlaugh spent at least a little time in the investigation of Spiritualistic phenomena, and would have spent more had he had the opportunity. Ingersoll's best orations breathed a spirit of hope concerning the life beyond. And "Saladin," our renowned contemporary of Agnostic Journal fame, has even gone further in his brilliant "At Random" column, and has spoken of the future rather in tones of one who knows than of one who has merely a tentative hope.

Again, the scientists, who not long since practically pooh-poohed the idea of another world being made known to this, are one by one making their investigations, in some cases overcoming great personal antipathy towards such phenomena as were reported. Those who have investigated the claims of "the next world" and the phenomena upon which those claims were built, have, in the main, been compelled to accept the evidence presented as perfectly valid, and proving their claim to not only consideration but acceptance.

Further, where the scientist has not troubled himself in the least concerning the reports of startling spiritual phenomena, but has confined himself entirely to the study of matter in its various forms, he also has been compelled to the conclusion that behind the sensory world termed the material there is another force and intelligence, and in this case has arrived at that point which would make the acceptance of the idea of another and conscious life after this a matter of far greater ease than it would have been twenty or thirty years ago.

The advance made of recent years has been almost incredible in its rapidity.

To change from gross supernaturalism which was founded on ignorance to the refined spiritual-naturalism of today has been accomplished with wondrous celerity.

The church has dropped its miracles where such would have called for a suspension of law, and has reached for and obtained a nobler and more elevated platform, from which it preaches a broader creed of love without hate; of a God minus his counter-attraction—a devil; of a heaven without the alternative of a terrible eternal torture chamber.

Up from the gloom of the past, with its vast terrifying mystic shapes flitting about in the outer darkness; up from the simple childish terror at forces unknown and forms not understood; up from the narrow, bigoted, persecuting charlatanry of a debauched priesthood, humankind has, as by a sudden leap, emerged to the joy of a dawning day, to the twilight of a growing hope, and to the firm ground of an eternal verity.

Let Spiritualists rejoice that they have been able to assist in this magnificent emancipation, the true value of which will only be appreciated by those who follow fifty or a hundred years hence. Let them rejoice practically by emulating the works of those who attracted widespread attention to the teachings and the facts of their best-loved cause.

The night is truly passing; but, unless Spiritualists prepare to take advantage of the full morning light, the sunrise may find them bereft of their birthright by their more progressive and aggressive brother, the "Church."

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

SECOND SIGHT IN FINMARK, A. D. 1500.

The following extract from an old document may interest the readers of Light. The original was discovered in the Vatican Archives by a friend of mine. It is a report in Latin, addressed to the Pope by an Archbishop of Nidaros (Dronthelm, in Norway), who has been identified with Erik Walkendorf (died 1522). The report refers to a voyage to Northern Lapland, there called Finmark, and one of the places visited was Vardo. I translate one paragraph:

"Again, there are in Finmark many persons of both sexes who are said to perceive, involuntarily, phantoms, and the returning dead present with them; the sign of which is, that when they see such sights, the tears rise spontaneously to their eyes, and they are struck with sudden pallor and alarm. Wonderful to relate, these persons perceive those who are drowned at sea far from home, or killed, and other deceased persons, who show themselves to their sight as though alive, before the fact is known to others; and the truth of this strange assertion is evidenced by the fact that I have questioned different people as to the same matter, without finding one iota of error or discrepancy."

The analogy with the Scotch "Second Sight" is obvious.

THE ANGELS' ANSWER.

I sit in my room in the twilight,
And softly the dim shadows fall,
As the firelight, fitfully glancing,
Lights faintly the darkening wall.

My thoughts, free from thralldom of body,
Go back over long gone-by years;
When shadow with sunshine was mingled;
When smiles were rarer than tears.

When earth seemed a prison-house gloomy,
My spirit a captive fast bound;
And dogma and creed of religion
Were all that my hungry soul found.

When the grave was an iron-bound portal,
Whose gates never swung to and fro
For spirits of loved ones immortal,
To comfort their dear ones below.

And I cried in despair and in anguish:
"Give one glimpse of that glorious band
To a mother, whose heart-strings are yearning
For the touch of a baby hand.

"Let me hear his sweet voice but a moment,
Tuned newly to melodies rare;
Let me know that the angels forever
Enfold him in tenderest care;

"And my doubt, and my anguish, and sorrow
Shall vanish forever away;
And the night of an old superstition
Be merged into perfect day."

Then, sudden, there dawned on my vision
A radiance wondrously fair;
And voices of angels' sweet singing
Came pulsing through all the air.

Forms shining and white-robed were round me;
And folded in Love's close embrace,
One brought me my baby, my Benny,
With such peace and content in his face;

That a gladness swept thro' my whole being
To know that a white baby-soul
Unshrived, and by priest unforgiven,
Was safe in the heavenly fold.

The glory grew dim, and the voices
Grew fainter, and faded away;
And the Summer-land gates swung together,
As shadows of night follow day.

But I know at that heavenly portal,
Nor keeper nor watchman held guard;
And the spirits of those who had loved us,
No more from their dear ones were barred.

Now, oft as I sit in the twilight,
Come voices so sweet to my ear;
And I sense the soft touch of a presence,
That tells me my little one's near.

O, mothers, who mourn in the darkness,
This message I gladly would sing:
"Look upward! The angels are waiting,
Sweet comfort and healing to bring.

"For the cord from the earth-life to heaven,
Can never be riven apart;
And the key to the heavenly portal,
Is the love of a mother's heart."

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 150 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

MARVELOUS POWERS.

As Manifested by Joseph Reis.

GIVES WONDERFUL EXHIBITION OF MIND READING BEFORE PHYSICIANS AND OTHERS.

What is Joseph Reis? Is he wizard, or clairvoyant, or what?

Within the next few days the answer to the question may perhaps be given by some of the most analytical and thoughtful members of the staff of professors and physicians at Johns Hopkins University, as arrangements are now being made to have Mr. Reis appear before them and give one of his peculiar "mental clinics."

To those who know the mere outside of things, Mr. Joseph Reis is one of the proprietors of the Hotel Gilsey, 300 West Fayette street; to those who have been given practical illustration of his phenomenal mind-reading, telepathic powers, or whatever his gift may be called, he appears to be one of the most wonderful individuals in the world. Mr. Reis is not a professional mind-reader or telepathic agent, in that he never gives illustrations of his gift for pecuniary reward, and, in fact, even his intimate personal friends are seldom indulged with a "mental clinic." Yet there are occasions, when, at the urgent pleadings of friends and members of the medical profession, the possessor of telepathic powers consents to show them.

PERFORMANCE WAS MARVELOUS.

One of these occasions was on last Friday afternoon, when Mr. Reis, at the request of two medical practitioners—Dr. John T. McCarthy, of the Board of Police Surgeons, and Dr. Bishop, also a member of the Board—gave an illustration of mind-reading which, in the opinion of both physicians, was marvelous. The performance was given in one of the dining-rooms of the Gilsey and before Drs. McCarthy and Bishop, Mr. Herbert J. Thurn, 831 Pennsylvania avenue, and a reporter of the News.

The first illustration was given to the reporter, who was asked to write three questions on three slips of paper. The questions were written while Mr. Reis was absent from the room. On the first slip of paper the reporter of the News wrote the maiden name of his mother. On the two other slips were written personal questions which the writer had no idea would be answered. The slips of paper were folded up and the writer placed them in his pocket. Mr. Reis entered the room and in quick, sharp tones ordered the questioner to take the papers from his pocket and press them against his (Mr. Reis') head.

TOLD SMALLEST DETAILS.

The papers were tightly wadded together, so that even the writer had no idea of which piece each query was written. Without a moment's hesitation, however, Mr. Reis, as soon as the papers were pressed against his head, repeated the questions, and to two of them, which were of an unusual character, returned answers that the questioner knew were correct, even to the smallest details. The maiden name of the questioner's mother, a somewhat uncommon name, was spelled out with ease by Mr. Reis.

Dr. Bishop, who is decidedly skeptical on matters of mysticism and telepathy, admitted that the reading was "very clever," but appeared to doubt that Mr. Reis could give a second successful illustration. Mr. Reis appeared to be in a very nervous condition, but consented to give a second exhibition. Dr. Bishop then retired to another table, and Mr. Reis left the room and did not return until called. Dr. Bishop wrote three questions on three slips of paper, on one a prescription which he had given to a patient on Friday morning; on the second, the name of a member of his family, and on the third the question, "Where am I thinking of going to-night?"

READS DOCTOR'S THOUGHT.

When the papers were pressed against Mr. Reis' forehead he answered by spelling the full name of the relative which Dr. Bishop had written. The question, "Where am I thinking of going to-night?" was spoken aloud by Mr. Reis, who without hesitation informed the physician that he intended going to a dance, and was thinking of it. This Dr. Bishop admitted was correct. The prescription was then taken in hand by the mind-reader. It was written, as is usual with physicians, in Latin, and the quantities of each ingredient were expressed in pharmaceutical symbols.

"Can anyone write Latin?" queried Mr. Reis sharply. "I want to dictate," he continued, "but not to Dr. Bishop."

Dr. McCarthy acted as amanuensis and slowly the mind-reader dictated the following, spelling out each ingredient:

"Salicylate of soda, one dram; pyrophosphite of iron, one dram; phosphate of soda, one ounce; aqua, six ounces. Tablespoonful every four hours."

The quantities, as before explained, were not spelled out as they are written here, but were in symbols.

DOESN'T KNOW HOW HE DOES IT.

The two physicians expressed their utter astonishment at this last feat. Mr. Reis appeared to be in an entirely normal condition, except that he was very pale and complained of fatigue. He replied frankly to questions regarding his mind-reading powers, but said that he had no idea of how he really accomplished the readings.

"Do you see the questions?" asked Dr. McCarthy.

"Yes and no," was the reply. "I see them, and yet do not see them. To save my life, I could not tell how I do the readings, but I am perfectly willing, as you suggest, to go before members of the faculty of Johns Hopkins and have them try to elucidate the mystery."

HAS POSSESSED GIFT FOR YEARS.

Mr. Reis has possessed the "gift" for a number of years, but lately it has become more pronounced. He is unable to give public performances because of the effect upon his health, and he even shrinks from private exhibitions. In the personal appearance of the mind-reader there is nothing to suggest his peculiar powers. He is about 35 years old, of medium size. His eyes are dark and expressive, and he has a very high and well-shaped brow. In commenting upon the exhibition, Dr. Bishop said:

"The man is a phenomenon. His readings were simply marvelous, and for the benefit of the whole medical profession, who are naturally interested in matters of this kind, I hope that we can take him over to Johns Hopkins for a mental test before the thoughtful and learned physicians of that institution. Whatever his power is, there is no doubt but that it is genuine, and that the readings are honest. A 'clinic' at the University may develop some facts that would interest the whole medical world."—Baltimore (Md.) News.

PSYCHIC SCIENCE.

It Is Claimed that It Proves the Doctrine of Reincarnation.

The steps taken by Columbus Bradford, a former minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, in accepting the theory of reincarnation as an explanation of some of life's mysteries and in declaring that the theory is "scriptural," will cause some of his colleagues to abuse him and doubtless may cause some others to stop and think.

A discussion of some of the ideas involved in this theory may interest the more serious portion of the readers of the Record-Herald. Now that science has accepted the theory of physical evolution, it is merely a matter of time when it will accept the theory of psychical evolution.

Every logical evolutionist who believes in the immortality of the soul will eventually face problems that only the theory of reincarnation can solve.

Evolution implies reincarnation. Evolution is the theory of the gradual progression of forms—that higher, more complex forms are evolved from the lower, simpler forms.

Reincarnation is the theory of the gradual progression of life. If there is an evolution of form there must be a corresponding evolution of life.

In his "Hints and Echoes of Japanese Inner Life," Lafcadio Hearn says: "With the acceptance of the doctrine of evolution, old forms of thought crumbled, new ideas everywhere arose to take the place of wornout dogmas, and we now have the spectacle of a general intellectual movement in directions strangely parallel with oriental philosophy."

RAPID STRIDES OF SCIENCE.

"The unprecedented rapidity and multiformity of scientific progress during the last fifty years could not have failed to provoke an equally unprecedented intellectual quickening among the non-scientific.

"That the highest and most complex organisms have been developed from the lowest and simplest; that a single physical basis of life is the substance of the whole living world; that no line of separation can be drawn between the animal and vegetable; that the difference between life and nonlife is only a difference of degree, not of kind; that matter is not less incomprehensible than mind, while both are but varying manifestations of one and the same unknown reality—these have already become the commonplaces of the new philosophy.

"After the first recognition, even by theology, of physical evolution, it was easy to predict that the recognition of psychical evolution (i. e., reincarnation) could not be indefinitely delayed, for the barrier erected by old dogma to keep men from looking backward had been broken down. And to-day for the student of scientific psychology the idea of pre-existence passes out of the realm of theory into the realm of fact."

The late Professor Huxley wrote of the theory of reincarnation: "None but hasty thinkers will reject it on the ground of inherent absurdity. Like the doctrine of evolution itself, that of transmigration (reincarnation) has its roots in the world of reality, and it may claim such support as the great argument from analogy is capable of supplying."

THEORY IS EXPLAINED.

This theory, as explained by the teachings of theosophy, implies a gradual differentiation from a condition of homogeneity to that of heterogeneity—the word "heterogeneity" implying life centers showing forth more or less individuality.

Strictly speaking, the word "reincarnation" applies to the evolutionary life processes only after the human stage has been reached. This theory is hoary with age. From time immemorial the Hindu sages have taught that variations in manifestation were caused by the latent potentialities trying to become active powers.

"These internal efforts being modified by external environment. These ideas are 'new' only in the sense of being so old that they have been forgotten.

"Any theory which shows such perennial life must have in it some element of truth and be worthy our serous consideration. Hume says this is 'the only theory of immortality that philosophy can hearken to.'"

If the soul is immortal then it must be ingenerable. And to reject the idea of immortality and reject the idea of pre-existence is about as logical as to declare that a stick has but one end. Again, this theory cannot be dismissed with the sneer—"It is only an old heathen idea!"

It is no more "heathen" than it is "Christian." True, it does not belong in the teachings of modern churchianity, but it did belong to the teachings of early Christianity.

CONDEMNED BY CHURCH.

Even a superficial knowledge of the early church history will show this. The Inostics, the earliest Christian philosophers, such as the Basilideans, the Valentinians, the Simonians, the Marcionites, etc., held the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul. Clement of Alexandria and Origen show the influence of this doctrine, and Origen's teachings were not placed under the ban of heresy until the sixth century.

Then the council of Constantinople issued the following: "Whoever shall support the mythical presentation of the pre-existence of the soul and the consequently wonderful opinion of its return, let him be anathema!"

Thus the Christian doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul received its death blow in the western world.

St. Jerome says that the doctrine of rebirth was an esoteric doctrine with the early Christians. Macrobius says there was the idea of two doors, called the "door of man" and the "door of the gods."

The former was reached by the process we now call that of involution, or the descent (or "fall") of man; the latter was reached by the process we now call evolution, or the ascent of man.

If we reject the theory of "special creation," then there is nothing left us but evolution, implying its companion theory, reincarnation.

Of the theory of "special creation," Herbert Spencer says: "It is worthless. Worthless as absolutely without evidence. Worthless in its intrinsic incoherence; worthless as not supplying an intellectual need; worthless as not satisfying a moral want. We must therefore consider it as counting for nothing in opposition to any other theory respecting the origin of organic beings."—Kate C. Havens in Chicago Record-Herald.

TELEPATHY.

Various Examples of Synchronized Thought.

Not long ago a gentleman suddenly conceived a desire to purchase the house in which he lived, says a writer in Cassell's Magazine. After thinking the matter over he wrote to his landlord—to whom he had never once mentioned it—asking him if he was willing to sell, and if so on what terms. He posted the letter at night. On the following morning he received one from the landlord, who suggested that he should buy the house. The two communications had crossed in the post.

Another gentleman, while sitting by his fireside at night, gave a start which made his wife inquire as to the cause. He replied that he had just remembered to whom he had lent one of his books which had long been missing—a former neighbor, then living twenty or thirty miles away. Acting on the spur of the moment, he then and there wrote a note to this gentleman, reminding him of the loan; but, as it was a very inclement night, and he had no other correspondence to dispatch, he determined to take it to town with him and post it the next morning. The letter, however, was never sent. When he came down to breakfast there lay on the table a parcel containing the very book whose whereabouts had flashed into his mind the previous night. The sender stated that it had been mislaid, and that he had only just found it.

Incidents of this kind, if they stood alone, might be looked upon as nothing but coincidences. But there are so many happenings of a similar nature that one is driven to the conclusion that there really is such a thing as telepathy or mental telegraphy—that many of our ideas come to us through the action of minds working at a distance. In other words, two minds are sometimes synchronized and move together without the knowledge at the time, of their respective owners. Numbers of such cases have come under the notice of the writer.

A contractor told him some time since of a curious one. He was engaged in putting the finishing touches to a tender which had to be in by the following morning, when it flashed upon him without any obvious cause whatever, that it would be politic for him to reduce by £500 the amount he had arrived at tentatively, or he might be underbid. And he acted accordingly and thereby obtained the contract, whereas he would have lost it had he kept to his original price.

Now, on the same night that he made the fortunate reduction in his estimate his son, who was in a distant part of the country, got to know, more by accident than design, the amount for which a rival had offered to do the work—some £300 and £400 less than the sum which his father had settled upon. This was a mortifying discovery, especially as there was no means whereby he could turn it to account, since it was too late to send a telegram that night and one in the morning would be useless. So he retired to his hotel and brooded over the matter. While so doing, his mind—apparently—unconsciously affected his father's mind.

A gentleman whom the writer knew more intimately had a parallel experience. He parted from his wife, who returned to her parents in a town about fifty miles away. Very soon he bitterly regretted this step and took upon himself all the blame; but his pride would not allow him to write and confess that he had been in the wrong. One afternoon, when he had been separated from his wife some months, he could not dismiss her from his thoughts. At length he pulled a writing pad towards him with the intention of writing the fateful letter. But he pushed it aside, put on his hat and went out.

As soon as he was in motion a conviction forced itself upon him that his wife was coming to the town then, at that moment. By some impulse, which he could never explain, he turned towards the railway station, and when he was half way up to it he saw her coming down, not alone, as he had pictured her, but in company with some friends whom she had come to visit—a visit of which he was in complete ignorance. A day or two afterwards man and wife met again, with the result that a reconciliation took place. The lady afterward said that she was thinking about her husband all the while she was traveling.

Similar in essentials was a story which an old lady used to tell. She had only one son—a sad scapegrace, but none the less her son. For good and sufficient reasons the father banished the lad to the colonies, and for some years afterwards he wrote to England fitfully.

Eventually the son's letters ceased altogether, and when the father died nothing had been heard of him for at least eighteen months. Desirous then that he should return home, the mother advertised for him in a number of colonial newspapers, but with a negative result.

One day "something told her" that her boy was not only alive, but actually coming back to the parental roof—a presentiment which affected her so powerfully that she gave orders that a bedroom should be got in readiness for him. And, sure enough, the scapegrace did come. He had not seen the advertisements and did not even know of his father's death.

Can one mind thus affect another even in sleep? It really seems as if two minds are sometimes attuned to such a degree. A lady once told the writer that her father had come down to breakfast that morning looking sorely troubled. He had had, he confided to her, a very distressing dream. He had seen a certain person (a third member of the family, whose whereabouts were then not known) lying by the roadside, dead.

"Now," she said, "I did not tell dad so, but I assure you that I had exactly the same dream last night."

If this nocturnal phantasm had "come true," the incident might have been attributed to supernatural agency; but inasmuch as the man whom both saw dead ultimately put in an appearance alive and well, how are you going to account for it except on the theory of telepathy or mental telegraphy?—Pittsburg Telegraph.

DO SPIRITS EXIST?

A Question Asked and Answered.

The history of the world is full of reported apparitions of ghosts. Do such things as ghosts exist? I am perfectly certain they do. This does not mean that I feel that I am ready to explain their origin or nature. I simply recognize the fact. Whether they are purely subjective or whether they represent some objective reality—this is a question to be settled in each particular case. I have many instances in my notes; but they must be omitted for the present.

There is one case, however, which is of a very extraordinary kind. It occurred about a couple of years ago here in the immediate vicinity of New York. There was a certain young man who had been studying abroad. He had been at Heidelberg University. He was anything but an imaginative temperament. Tall and stalwart in build, he had a reputation as an athlete. His favorite studies were mathematical, physical and electrical. He had returned home from abroad, and so far as anybody knew, was in perfect health. He was at the summer home of his mother. It was his habit, after dinner, to go out on the plazza and walk up and down while smoking his pipe. One evening he came quietly in, and, without talking with anybody, went up to bed. The next morning he went into his mother's room before she was up, and laid his hand on her cheek in order to awaken her quietly. Then he said: "Mother, I have something very sad to tell you. You must brace yourself and be strong to bear it." Of course she was startled and asked him what he was talking about. He said: "Mother, I mean just about what I am saying. I am going to die, and very soon."

When his mother, startled and troubled, pressed him for an explanation, he said: "Last night, when I was walking up and down the plazza, smoking, a spirit appeared and walked up and down by my side. I have received my call, and am going to die." The mother, of course, was seriously troubled, and wondered whether anything might be the matter with him. She therefore sent for the doctor and told him the story. The doctor made a careful examination, said there was nothing the matter, treated the whole thing as a bad dream or an hallucination, told them to pay no attention to it, and said that within a few days they would be laughing at themselves for letting such a thing worry them. The next morning the young man did not seem quite as well as usual, and the doctor was sent for a second time. Again he said there was nothing the matter and tried to laugh them out of their fears. The third morning the young man appeared in still poorer condition and the third time the physician was summoned. He now discovered a case of appendicitis. The young man was operated on and died in a couple of days. From the time of his vision until his death not more than five days had gone by. Some time after this experience the mother visited a psychic here in New York. She made no previous appointment, but went as a perfect stranger and waited her turn. The son claimed at once to be present and told his mother a whole series of very remarkable things, which by no possibility could the psychic ever have known. Then in answer to the question, "Who was it that you saw that night?" (the question being purposely so framed as not to seem to refer to anybody out of the body), he at once replied: "It was my father." The father had been dead for some years and the mother had been married again.—Ainslee's Magazine.

THE WAVERLY HOME.

Some Unfavorable Points Stated.

To the Editor:—Upon last anniversary day in Boston, urgent appeals were successfully made in behalf of the Veteran Spiritualists' Home in Waverly, Mass., a town about ten miles from Boston. Subscriptions came thick and fast from earnest followers of our movement. One of my neighbors gave one hundred dollars, and the result is that to-day Mr. Harrison D. Barrett, the treasurer of the fund to obliterate the indebtedness of the home has about $2,500 in his possession, and in almost each issue of his paper we find urgent appeals for more funds for the completion of the work in question, and about as much more money being required as is already raised.

Now I am in hearty accord with the proposition of establishing a home for worthy mediums and Spiritualists, but I have never contributed anything towards this project, simply because I have no faith in it. My father always said when he bought anything, that he always conducted the business so as to be sure he would have something when he had concluded the purchase.

For the purpose of obtaining possession of the true facts in the case, I recently made a pilgrimage to the property in question, and after a careful study of the situation, analyzed the problem thus:

1. The property is already mortgaged for more than it is worth.

2. For several years or ever since its acquisition by the Veteran Spiritualists' Union, an expense of about five hundred dollars per year has been incurred from interest, etc.

3. The property thus far has never been used for the purpose intended.

4. The property never can be used for the objective purpose until a compulsory expenditure of several thousand dollars be made in the way of alterations, improvements, etc.

5. For the past four years the paid caretakers who reside there have been a couple of the Presbyterian faith, people not in sympathy with our movement and who, I have been told, sneer at the mediums' controls when meetings are sometimes held there on Sundays in summer.

6. The house is situated less than 100 feet from the steam railroad tracks and less than 200 feet from the depot.

7. There is a first-class mosquito factory on the other side of the house, in the shape of a bog-hole about 100 feet away—and I was assured by near-by residents (and there are plenty of them) that the products from this factory were the source of great annoyance during the mosquito season.

8. There is not more than a quarter of an acre of tillable land.

Now, Mr. Editor, please to carefully digest these facts from a mental standpoint and see if you can question the impropriety of the liberal element of our movement continuing to longer throw good money after bad; and would you not pity our sensitives who might be doomed to live in the midst of such environments? MISSIONARIES.

Their Work in China, Japan and Hawaii.

To the Editor:—The Honolulu Evening Bulletin of April 21, 1902, contains some interesting information as to the progress of the Christian missionaries in Japan. Dr. Alexander, a missionary from Japan, discoursed on the difficulties met with and problems which confront the new missionary upon his arrival in Japan.

The acquisition of the language is a very hard task; and two years' time is required, and as yet no missionary has mastered the language perfectly. Under these circumstances, it strikes me that the average missionary is a mighty poor teacher to dispense Christianity to the Japs, or anything else. Many of the old vassals and military class, which in the beginning of the reign of the present Emperor were left almost destitute or with small possessions, are yet proud and independent, and have taken hold of ecclesiastical affairs with their own hands. They hold the majority in practically all the presbyteries and synods in Japan. They are men of keen intellect, educated, and well read in both Chinese and English literature to such an extent that many of them are better educated than the average clergyman in the States. They can excel him in preaching, principally because of their knowledge of the language and also because they are generally born orators. It seems, therefore, to be the best plan, says Dr. Alexander, for the missionary to efface himself as much as practicable, as he in this way will have more influence than if he asserts himself too much, which almost invariably leads to trouble.

"Still another problem is how to make the Gospel acceptable to the Japanese mind. To this it is necessary to gain intimate knowledge of the Japanese mode of thought. Many Japanese are at present in a state which is practically atheism. They have thrown over Buddhism and Confucius and have no religious belief whatever. Of these, many, especially the young men, are inquiring into Christianity to find out if this religion offers them anything better and to answer their searching questions is a task which taxes the brain of the missionary to the utmost.

"With regard to statements which have been made that Buddhism is winning as many converts as Christianity is in Japan, Dr. Alexander said that it was hard to say just what would happen in America. In the light of the history of theosophy and other teachings, it was quite possible that Buddhism might gain great headway in the States."

It has been understood by all intelligent people that the troubles in China so recently, were caused by the meddlesome missionaries. Perhaps it would be a pious notion if the good Christian people would save their shekels and not squander them among the "raging" heathen, where they seem to be doing so little good and so much harm.

I have before me a private letter from a lady friend in Honolulu, dated April 22, 1902. She says: "The Hawaiians are a fine race; strong in body, fine features and good intellect, with the truthfulness of a child with whom faith had never been broken, until the 'missionary' came. They came and brought the gospel. The Hawaiians had all the land and the government. Now the missionaries have the government and the land, and the Hawaiians can have the gospel; and if there is a word that ever was hated with all the vehemence that can be crowded into the word, more than the Hawaiians hate the word missionary, I do not know it.

"An effort is being made to disfranchise the Hawaiians, but I do not believe the government in Washington will allow such a thing to be done."

We congratulate our lady friend for her independence in denouncing shams, whether religious or political.

We hope Providence will spare the island. From volcanoes and all other evils "good Lord deliver them."

Camp-Meeting at Wonewoc, Wis., July 12 to 26 Inclusive.

The program and preliminary arrangements for the Wonewoc Camp are rapidly nearing completion, and the illustrated announcements, will be ready about June 15.

This camp is given by the Western Wisconsin Camp Association, chartered by the state association, and organized for the purpose of spreading the truths of Spiritualism; through the medium of camp and other meetings.

Wonewoc is the home of one of the oldest Spiritualist societies in the state of Wisconsin. Here a faithful few, years ago, banded together, and for Truth's sake struggled against opposition and persecution, gradually growing, until now they own their own little Temple, and the grounds upon which the camp is to be held this year.

The camp grounds are situated on a bluff, and afford a fine view of the town and valley below. The air is pure and spiritual, and those who make it a point to visit Wonewoc will go hence with a feeling that they have been benefited not only spiritually, but physically. The location is at once picturesque and beautiful.

The Chicago and Northwestern railroad runs six daily trains through Wonewoc, as the town is situated on the main line of that road. The Omaha road comes within 12 miles, which gives splendid railroad facilities.

The best of talent will be placed on the rostrum, and a treat is in store for all. Moses and Mattie Hull, those sturdy pioneer workers, are engaged; Mrs. Catharine McFarlin, one of the most pleasing workers we have, and Mrs. Frances Wheeler, formerly of Madison, but now of LaCrosse, whose test work at Wonowoc camp last year, gave such universal satisfaction, and Will J. Erwood, of LaCrosse, are also secured for the entire session.

Besides these, the management is in correspondence with other well known workers, some of whom will be added to the program, thus making the program one of exceptional strength.

This camp will offer a splendid opportunity to those living in southern Minnesota and western Wisconsin, to enjoy an outing and a spiritual feast. Meals will be served at reasonable rates, on the grounds. Two excellent hotels will serve the visitors with the best at the lowest prices. For all rates, and general information, write to the secretary of the camp association.

All those wishing tents should apply early. Make your arrangements ahead of time and thereby avoid all confusion.

The grounds will be much more easy of access this year, than they were last. This means much greater comfort. Lyceum work will be a feature of the camp, as it is Mrs. Hull's wish to get our state lyceum work thoroughly organized as soon as possible. Special days will be appointed for the consideration of state and other valuable work.

Mysteries of Hypnotism Revealed.

This book was printed for you; it was printed to teach the public the many marvels of the wonder power of the age; it was printed that all might learn the long lost secrets of a hidden science; it was printed for the poor as well as the rich, that all might stand an equal chance in the race of life. The finest artists were employed to illustrate it. Twenty eminent scientists divulge their secrets in its intensely interesting pages. No other book of the kind in any way compares with it; no other book is so beautiful so interesting, so thrilling, so comprehensive, so practical. It is a work that should be in every home. It should be read by every father and mother. It tells how you may learn the marvelous mysteries of the greatest power known to man.

This grand book gives you the key to the inner secrets of mind control. It describes practical methods for using hypnotism and personal magnetism in business and society. It tells how to strengthen your will power, your memory, your self confidence. It tells you how to drive all suggestions of failure from your mind and replace it with a firm determination to succeed in anything you undertake. It tells you how to brush aside all hindrances to your progress and success. It gives you the ability to impress people with your real worth. It tells you how to completely master human minds and strangely control the thoughts, actions and desires of whom ever you will. The American College guarantees to teach you all these things, and hundreds of others equally beneficial. You can learn at home during your leisure hours.

For a limited time only it will be sent to any address absolutely free.

When you master hypnotism and personal magnetism you will be in possession of a mighty advantage over your fellow-men. You will be able to pass your competitors in any line of endeavor; you will be able to fascinate and influence others; you can do a vast amount of good by curing diseases and bad habits; you can change the bad disposition of children and correct their evil tendencies; you can earn a great deal of money by treating people; you can develop to a marvelous degree any musical or dramatic talent you or your friends may possess; you can give thrilling hypnotic demonstrations and afford your friends an endless source of amusement; you can be the center of attraction at any social gathering; you can cure yourself of business or domestic worry; you can win the ever lasting friendship of those you desire; you can protect yourself against the influence of others; you can develop your telepathic or clairvoyant power; you can increase your salary or income; you can win wealth and renown. If you want a copy of the remarkable book here mentioned, which clearly explains the wonders of Hypnotism and discloses its deepest mysteries, send your name and address to the American College of Sciences, Dept. RELIGION OF THE FUTURE. By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., president of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement. Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds. It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has a full page portrait of the angel heroine, from a spirit painting. Price, $1.00.

SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1902.

The Spirit of Boycotting.

Ever since first starting The Progressive Thinker we have met with a certain obstacle that continually raises its hydra-head and threatens our destruction. While always threatening, boisterous, and somewhat cruel in its aspect, and eminently calculated to make one exceedingly tired, yet it has not seriously interfered with our prosperity and our happiness.

This is an obstacle that all newspapers meet—no exception; it is a factor which each one must take into consideration, and this is its concise nature:

"You can't please all."

Try as hard as one possibly can, yet there is the sad aspect, the one who is displeased boycotts the object of his displeasure, banishes it from his presence, and henceforth feels morose and sour in reference to it. This is an aspect that everyone who publishes a paper has got to face, particularly if engaged in publishing one devoted to the promulgation of Spiritualism.

The first year that we started The Progressive Thinker one of our most efficient workers, who sent in a large number of subscribers, finding that we were determined to conduct our paper on lines we had already marked out, became offended, and at once banished the paper from his own fireside. He wanted the paper conducted in a manner that it would not antagonize the Catholic church; that is take no exceptions whatever to its odious methods and doctrines.

We paid no attention to his boycott.

This man has sunk into obscurity, having deprived himself of certain valuable information only found in The Progressive Thinker.

A lady in New York boycotted our paper because some correspondent had taken away her Jesus, and threatened the very existence of a God.

A gentleman down South boycotted the paper because we refused to publish one of his articles. He afterwards admitted he had made a consummate donkey of himself, and once more became a subscriber.

A gentleman in the East gave us particular fits because we would not publish his exposure of a medium.

Another man out west boycotted us because we did spread before our readers an alleged exposure.

We lost a club of subscribers out West because we "favored the truthfulness of materialization."

A man of apparent intelligence stopped his paper because we did not publish his encomiums of a certain materializing medium.

An old lady boycotted the paper because we were too severe on the churches.

An atheistically-inclined Spiritualist stopped his paper because we "leaned too much towards a God.

An old white-haired Spiritualist and speaker boycotted this office, because we refused to let him defend a medium who was known to continually cheat.

In fact there has not been a single feature of The Progressive Thinker that has not seriously offended some one.

Outside, however, of this grimly dissatisfied element, which in itself amounts to but very little as factors in Spiritualism, there is a large, influential class that have been regular patrons of our paper, sustaining it nobly and so far outnumbering the dissatisfied, that they look insignificant and sickly when compared with them. To say that The Progressive Thinker has flourished ever since it was first inaugurated, is putting it mildly. The mutterings of the dissatisfied, the fraudulent medium fake or impostor have never in the least affected the prosperity of The Progressive Thinker. It has had one continual harvest ever since its first issue.

The Adventists' Prediction.

The Second Coming of Christ and the end of the world is the latest prediction of the Adventists, inspired by the explosion of Mt. Pelee. After so many similar predictions and as many failures, it seems curious and that the sanity of anyone advocating the Adventist doctrines would be seriously questioned. The time is still fresh in the minds of this matter-of-fact old world's people when many of these fanatics gave away all they had and prepared to meet the Savior on his second trip to this planet, and the world failed to collapse, and Christ failed to show up. This prediction is comparable to a certain tribe of Indians who possess a wise old medicine man who has predicted the extinction of the white race, and that the earth will be covered with new soil that will grow food for the Indians; also game will be placed upon the earth in abundant quantities, and the Red Man will be able to live without work.

One would not expect a more rational prophecy from the poor ignorant Indian, but we want to think that the white man will outgrow such nonsense in the course of time, with the facilities at hand for studying the various sciences that might enlighten them in regard to the impossibility and improbability of such an occurrence.

If Christ ever had a first coming he should be able to come and communicate to earth, or at least appear on the quiet to some of his followers and remind them that they have gone astray from his teachings in the old Bible.

Plain Hints Toward Effective Work.

After the old theological methods and lines of thinking have become interwoven or inwrought into the texture of one's mental constitution, fixed therein by the influence of early education in Sunday-School and Church, it requires little less than a miracle of mental transformation to eradicate it from one's being. The habit so formed and ingrown can hardly be eliminated except by long and painful process whereby old notions once tenaciously held are outgrown and cast aside, with many a painful wrench and conflict within.

How many old Spiritualists have realized in their own experience this painful process of giving up the old faith, and accepting the new truth that has been borne in and upon them with a moral force they could not honestly withstand. Only the force of evidence appealing to their objective senses and moral principles appealing to their innate conceptions of truth and justice, could suffice to tear them away from the old formations and build them up firmly on the new basis.

It is natural for minds to be tenacious of that which they have long held as truth; and sometimes prejudice is exceeding hard to be overcome. It is a sad thing to become schooled into false and erroneous beliefs, and into prejudice against principles and truths of high and good import and quality. To educate one's self out from the old and false and into the new and true, is often an exceedingly difficult and painful process.

The moral of this, to Spiritualists in particular, is this: The urgent need of beginning with the young. Would that Spiritualists understood this as well as Catholics and Protestants understand it. They realize that without this preemptive education of the children, neither the Catholic church nor the Protestant churches could maintain their numerical strength, much less increase the same. The diffusive influence of general education and free thought would soon kill these churches, in their distinctive denominational and theological aspects, were it not for the influence of early "religious" education and bias, imparted in Sunday-Schools, etc.

Let Spiritualists, realizing the importance of the right early training of the minds of the children, enter into the work with the zeal and earnestness of the churches in their Sunday-Schools, and the progress of our Cause will be marked with rapid and solid growth, and in due time many a weak society will thereby be made strong.

It will not be amiss, in conclusion, to say that all needful instructions for forming and conducting Progressive Lyceums may be found in Tuttle's Lyceum Guide. It will be found just the manual needed.

The Deed Is Done.

At last the Presbyterians have changed their creed. The metal has been in the crucible for a long time and the crucible has been in the hands of the younger and more progressive element from first to last.

It was a solemn scene that attended the passage of the committee's report. The effect was accentuated by the unconcealed sorrow of the elders—in reality as well as in name—who felt so deeply that the new departure, as one of them put it, "was indeed 'the beginning of the end.'"

In times to come those who have occasion to review the epoch-making action may wonder at the records, which show but two dissenting votes against the report, which is fraught with such deep significance to the church.

Two negatives, indeed, were all that were noted as the vote was taken; but one hundred times two—if the statement of one of the commissioners is to be accepted—were in their hearts opposed to the passage of the measure, which marks a breaking away from old ties, but which was urged upon the session by the younger element.

The most significant changes as tending to show the increased liberality of the church are those relating to infant damnation and the Pope.

In the revised creed the old text has been changed to read:

"We believe all dying in infancy are included in the election of grace and are regenerated and saved by Christ through the spirit who works when and how he pleases."

The Pope of Rome is no longer referred to in the Confession of Faith as anti-Christ, which was the term formerly used.

A new chapter was added to the Confession of Faith, concerning the love of God for all men, missions and the Holy Spirit.

Several chapters of the Confession which were not in that form are made declaratory.

Now that they have crawled over towards Universalism it may some day be expected that they will rise up out of all dogma and teach the doctrine of Christ, at least.

Australia More Progressive than the United States.

Miss Vida Goldstein, who came to the United States as a delegate from Australia to the International Equal Suffrage Association and also to investigate for the Australian Government the penal institutions of the United States, has been lecturing in many of the large cities in this country.

In commenting upon her lectures in Boston a writer in the Boston Transcript says:

"Just why it is that men of intelligence are apparently broader in tolerance in that country than in this is not easily explained, nor why the women of another continent as large in area as the United States have proved themselves more progressive and unitedly willing than the women of America to put to the test an experiment so far-reaching in its importance as this privilege of suffrage for women. Apparently nothing has happened as yet to disturb Australian homes in general, or unsex her women who avail themselves of this opportunity. The great Commonwealth at the antipodes is all serenely unconscious of the demoralizing sequelae of voting, which form the chief arguments of dissenters in this country. Psychologically, it is a curious problem that a phase of evolution so natural and logical, which is predicted so unmistakably by the march of events all over the world, should be conceded so grudgingly in a country which is a synonym for progress, liberty, and enlightenment, and where resistance to taxation without representation is a historic slogan, while in a comparatively new country, which owes allegiance to a monarchy, the emancipation from the Oriental ideas of woman's place is established without difficulty."

SPIRITUALISM A RELIGION.

Word comes from Los Angeles, Cal., that Judge Smith reversed the verdict of the police court in the case of J. E. and Maud Chesbro, convicted by Judge Austin of the crime of "practicing the business and art of mediumship, clairvoyance and life reading, receiving fees for the exercise and exhibition of their art without having first obtained a license from said city, so to do.' They were fined $30.

"There is no question," said his honor, "that the city has the right to license all trades, business and professions, practiced within its precincts. This is a general right guaranteed the municipality by the law of the land, but there is one exception to the callings that shall be licensed. This exception is found in the constitution of the state, which declares that any and all religions may be practiced without hindrance or discrimination. Of course this provision is not to be construed so as to interfere in any manner with the policy of the state. Until more light is thrown upon the subject, neither the court nor the jury has a right to declare that Spiritualism is not a religious belief. In the event it is shown to be such, no license can be imposed upon its advocates or devotees.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

The above heading might indicate a personal attack upon the son of the Standard Oil magnate who is accounted the richest man in the world, but it stands for no such thing.

In morals young Rockefeller is said to be a model man. He is steady going and without any of the vices so common to the young men of to-day, such as drinking, smoking, swearing, etc., and seems moved with a spirit for good, and is no doubt sincere in his little occasional talks to Sunday-School classes, but more business-like than philosophical. In one of his recent talks before his Bible class in the Fifth Avenue Baptist church, New York City, he compared the church of God to a trust, and advised everybody to get in as stockholders rather than try to do spiritual business as individuals.

Now the young man may be all right, but who are the stockholders in this great institution in which Jehovah holds the majority of the stock? Were any of them at the foot of Mt. Pelee, in the recent cyclones or mine explosions? If so there must have been little method in the madness of Jehovah on these occasions.

He also likened the Standard Oil monopoly to an American Beauty rose, whose fine perfection could only be obtained by destroying all other flowers around it and getting a monopoly on fragrance. This sounds very poetic or flowery, to say the least, but are not such inspiring thoughts rather inappropriate, presented to a Sunday-School class? Isn't it illogical, except from the standpoint of a trust representative?

It must have been a soothing balm to a deep business wound for those within the sound of his voice whom the Standard Oil Company had crushed out of business, if such persons were in his presence.

As to the church being a trust, that has been the claim through its entire existence. It has claimed to possess the only true method of salvation, the only clear title to the great white throne and a monopoly on the Lord Jesus Christ. The young man is only repeating the stereotyped gospel of the church, as the parrot repeats the words it has had drilled into it. But is it good religion? Just at the present time the country is in the iron grasp of trusts of all kinds and sizes and the evils thereof are glaring. It has come to a condition where the small merchants can scarcely exist and the man of small means has no chance in a business undertaking in competition with the large establishments under the management of the trusts; but what of the church? In but few of the largest churches in the land will be found patrons sufficient to meet the enormous expense. So there is no comparison here with the business trust. One handles the necessities and the consumers must have their wares, and the other deals out promises that forever remain unfulfilled. One deals in physical supplies and can, upon gaining a monopoly, take advantage of the physical requirements to enrich themselves, and the other presumes to deal in spiritual things they cannot deliver, and there you have the analysis of the young man's verdant and mossy reflections and the fallacy of his ancient theological deductions.

Mysterious Power.

According to a statement in the McLeansboro Leader, a young lady named Bond, about 18 years old, living with her uncle, James Bond, near Olga, is possessed of a power that in olden times would have sent her to the stake as a witch. The young lady is able to open any lock without the aid of a key that has ever been given to her to unlock. The first that was known of this was when the family noticed that Miss Bond, without any apparent effort, opened a wardrobe that was always kept locked. When asked if she had a key she replied that she did not, and when questioned further declared that she did not know how it was done, but that she could unlock any lock given her without the aid of any key. She further demonstrated this a short time after by unlocking a fiddle case, with a spring lock, in which the key had been accidentally left.

Miss Bond does not like the notoriety this strange power gives her, and can but seldom be persuaded to exercise it, but at times has demonstrated that she possesses it to the satisfaction and mystification of those who have witnessed it. C. H. Lasater had a brass padlock, the key of which had been lost and he could find no key that would unlock it. The keyhole is so small that the end of a small knife blade can be inserted in it. He gave it to Mr. Bond, who took it home, asking her if she could unlock it. She replied that she could if she wanted to. Handing her the lock, she talked a little bit to him and then suddenly handed it back unlocked, and Mr. Bond brought the lock to town last week to show Mr. Lasater. In a conversation with the Leader, Mr. Bond told of many instances where his niece had exercised her mysterious power and declared his belief that she could unlock any lock, no matter how intricate, without the aid of a key. The Leader suggested to Mr. Bond that he bring the young lady to town and have her give a public demonstration of her strange power, but he said she was averse to the notoriety such an exhibition would give her. Can any one explain what occult power this young lady possesses? Yes, it is simply spirit power that enables her to do this feat.

A Magnificent Premium.

It is truly a matter for mutual congratulation between yourself and your subscribers that you have placed the magnificent work of Hudson Tuttle, the "Religion of Man and Ethics of Science" in your list of premium books to subscribers. It is different in many respects from the other premium books, and fits in with wise adaptation to form with the others a variety of spiritual literature to meet the wants of all classes of minds. No Spiritualist, nor others, can read the "Religion of Man and Ethics of Science," without profit in knowledge of important truths pertaining to the nature, derivation and historical development of religion, and the ethics of science as viewed from the standpoint of the spiritual philosophy. It is one of Mr. Tuttle's best works, and that is saying much. Outwardly the book is neat and tasty, and the contents make it worth its weight in gold.

Hammond, Ind. JAS. C. UNDERHILL.

Important Suggestion.

E. C. Waldron writes from Chesaning, Mich.: "Why not ask through The Progressive Thinker that all Spiritualists, and as many others as see fit, donate for the next ten years one dollar each, to be paid yearly, for the benefit of the Reed City Home, and pledge themselves to do it unless passing out hinders their doing so. My wife and I will do it and if 5,000 or 10,000 will do so, see what would be in the treasury for a Mediums' Home. What a blessing it would be and there is not a person in the United States but that can give one dollar. See what can be done."

The above is a most excellent suggestion. Every Spiritualist who can, who is actuated by humanitarian feelings, should send the following on a postal card to Dr. A. B. Spinney, Reed City, Michigan:

"Dr. A. B. Spinney—Dear Sir:—I promise to pay to you promptly on the first day of each year, as long as it is possible for me to do so, the sum of ONE DOLLAR, to be used exclusively for the benefit of the Reed City Home for Mediums." (Sign name and full address.)

There should be at least 10,000 Spiritualists in the United States who are actuated by a benevolent spirit. Send in your promise at once.

Religion and Education in Germany.

As is well known, says the Ethical Record, all children in Germany must share in the orthodox religious instruction that obtains in the public schools, unless they receive religious teaching from some parish school recognized by the State. In consequence of this obligation, it happens that the children of free thinkers are forced to accept a public school training in a religion which their parents reject, or perhaps even ridicule.

The German Ethical Societies are consequently devoting themselves to demonstrate by spoken and written words, in widespread propaganda, that the problem of public school ethical instruction can be solved far more successfully by means of a teaching whose sanctions do not depend on beliefs or unbeliefs, but are based on common spiritual experience. Schools that replace dogmatic religious teaching by moral instruction are forbidden in Germany. Hence the German ethicists can only point to the example of America; and must content themselves with arranging courses in moral instruction in nearby Switzerland. During the summer such a course is to be given at Zurich for the benefit of teachers of both sexes.

Honesty Among Mohammedans.

William E. Curtis, who is now traveling in the Orient, speaks of an "honesty" among the Mohammedans that does not prevail among the Christian nations. He says:

There is very little disorder in Palestine, very little crime, and none of the vices known to civilized countries. No man ever gets drunk unless he is a Christian, for the Mohammedans abstain from wine and all other intoxicating liquors. They do not steal from each other, except cattle and goats, and that is a capital offense, punishable by death on sight. Ordinary stealing is practically unknown. There are no locks on the doors of any of the houses and the curtains of the tents are always loose, for several reasons, the chief of which is that the people haven't anything worth stealing. They never have money and carry on their backs everything of value. Millions of dollars' worth of merchandise is carried over this trail by camel caravans every year, yet nothing is ever lost.

The same is true in South America, where the transportation is done by mules and llamas over the mountains. Cargoes of bullion are carried regularly every day, yet guards are unnecessary, and burglar-proof safes could not be used. The mule drivers are perfectly trustworthy, and occasionally when some foreign adventurer organizes a raid, like one of the train robberies in the United States, they will die in defense of their cargoes.

"Spiritual Songs for the Use of Circles, Camp-meetings and Other Spiritualistic Gatherings." By Mattie E. Hull. For sale at this office. Price 10 cents.

Mrs. Nellie J. T. Brigham.

This noble worker in the ranks of Spiritualism passed through Chicago one day last week on her way to Australia. The Spiritualists of Australia and New Zealand have had that eloquent sage, Dr. J. M. Peebles, and the brilliant Colville to lecture for them. Mrs. Brigham will supplement their work in a most excellent manner. She is lovable as a woman, attractive and interesting as a speaker, and she will certainly prove a drawing card for all the societies that engage her.

Mrs. Helen T. Brigham.

The meetings of the Spiritual and Ethical Society came to a close for the season on Sunday, May 25. It was also a day of good-byes to our dear speaker, Mrs. H. T. Brigham, and our dear president, Miss Cushman, who are now on their way to Australia. The morning meeting was held at Tuxedo Hall owing to the large number of people who wanted to see and hear once more before their departure, the wonderful inspirations from the lips of one of our noblest, best and highest speakers, pure and spotless in her life and character, a fit medium for the holy words of inspiration that fall from her lips.

We part from her with tears and prayers for her safe return, and that of her noble companion, our beloved president and founder of this society. Mrs. Brigham was more than usually grand in her inspirations as she answered the numerous questions that awaited her, and if each of her hearers could live the lessons she taught, we would have a little heaven here below. None but the most depraved could have heard the pure words of inspiration without being benefited by them. I cannot imagine a being so lost as not to recognize the angelic presence as the pure white light comes over her face, as she quietly yields herself to the divine control.

We know she is going where she will do much good, and will have large audiences, but a world of love from our little band goes with them to that distant land, and will be a magnet to draw them back to us in due time.

The evening meeting was held in our our usual place and a smaller audience met to give, not good-bye, but from our full hearts we said "Auf wiedersehen."

Our meetings will begin on the first Sunday in November, with some of the best speakers on the spiritual platform, and in a larger and more comfortable hall, yet to be selected. Our building fund is growing slowly, but we expect to see it swell to important dimensions by the time another year rolls by, as we have plans which include hard work for every member of the society, and we ask all Spiritualists to help in this grand work. New York is a missionary field that is not excelled in any other part of the world. The only large city, I believe, that has not one Spiritual Temple. Come, Spiritualists, help our little band to have one.

Camp opens Aug. 17, and closes Sept. 7, 1902. W. F. Randolph, secretary, Ashley, Ohio.

Clinton, Ia.
The camp-meeting of the M. V. S. A., at Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa, will open July 28, continuing to and including August 25. Announcements and full information may be had by addressing the secretary, Mrs. Stella A. Fisk, 18 N. 11th street, Keokuk, Iowa.

Mantua, Ohio.
Camp session opens July 28 and closes September 2. This is a favorite camp in Ohio. For full program, address Lucy King, Box 45, Mantua Station, Ohio.

Cassadaga, N. Y.
This favorite place of resort will open its yearly session, July 11 and closes August 24. Write the secretary, A. A. Gaston, Meadville, Pa., for information regarding the camp, and for programs.

Vicksburg, Mich.
The nineteenth camp-meeting will be held at Vicksburg, commencing August 2, and closing August 25. For program address Jeannette Frazer, Vicksburg, Mich.

Etna, Wash.
The Spiritualists of Clarke county, Washington, will hold a grand camp-meeting in Etna, from August 9 to the 23d. This is a lovely place in the mountains; fine water; excellent trout fishing; a beautiful grove; good speakers, mediums and music. For full particulars address Henry B. Allen, manager, Etna, Clarke county, Washington.

Onset, Mass.
Opens July 13 and closes Aug. 31. For full program of this delightful place of resort, address Onset Bay Camp-Meeting Co., Onset, Mass.

Freeville, N. Y.
Regular camp opens July 26 and closes August 12. For programme, address A. C. Stone, secretary.

Island Lake, Mich.
Camp session for 1902 begins July 27 and closes August 25. For programs address A. G. Brown, 260 Twenty-first street, Detroit, Mich.

Ottawa, Kan.
Spiritualist camp-meeting, Forest Park, Ottawa, Kansas, August 22 to August 30. Send for program to H. W. Henderson, president, Lawrence, Kan., or Jacob Hey, secretary, Overbrook, Kan.

Grand Ledge, Mich.
Grand Ledge Spiritualist Camp-meeting will open July 27, and close August 24. For full particulars and programs, write to Geo. H. Sheets, Grand Ledge, Mich.

Lake Brady, O.
This camp will open July 13, and close August 31. Address all communications to A. G. Keck, secretary, I. O. O. F. Temple, Akron, Ohio.

Sheridan Gulch, Ill.
A Spiritualist camp-meeting will open at Sheridan Gulch, July 6, under direction of Emma J. Hanson. Write to her at 76 Bingham street, Chicago, until July 1. After that at Sheridan.

New Era, Oregon.
Commences July 5, and closes July 21. For full particulars address Lorena Lazelle, secretary, Oregon City, Oregon.

Waukesha Camp, Wis.
The second annual camp of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association will be held in beautiful Waukesha, during the entire month of August. This camp offers unusual advantages to campers. Come and have a good time, and partake of the famous mineral waters. For full particulars write Will J. Erwood, secretary, 1334 Pine street, LaCrosse, Wis.

Briggs Park, Mich.
Briggs Park Camp, Grand Rapids, Mich., opens July 6 and closes August 3. For programs and information, send postal to Thos. J. Haynes, secretary, 164 Scribner street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Franklin, Neb.
The Franklin Spiritualists will hold their seventh annual camp-meeting, commencing July 11 to July 28. H. J. Nead, president; William Shelburn, vice-president; D. L. Haines, secretary. For full information address D. L. Haines, Franklin, Neb.

Niantic, Conn.
The Niantic Camp, located at a delightful place, Niantic, Ct., commences June 24, and continues until September 9. For full program address the secretary, Mary A. Hatch, South Windham, Conn.

Los Angeles, Cal.
The Southern California Spiritualist Camp-Meeting Association, of Los Angeles, Cal., will open this year, August 17, and close September 14. Address for information, J. D. Griffith, secretary, 101½ South Broadway, Los Angeles, Cal.

Saugus Center, Mass.
The Lynn Spiritualists Association will hold meetings every Sunday, ending September 28, at Unity Camp, Saugus Center, Mass. The very best mediums and speakers will be present.

Verona Park, Me.
The annual camp-meeting at Verona Park will open July 27, and close Aug. 19. F. W. Smith secretary, Rockland, Maine.

Lake Pleasant, Mass.
The New England Spiritualists' Camp-meeting Association will open July 28, and continue for thirty days, including five Sundays. Albert P. Blinn, Clerk, 603 Tremont street, Boston, Mass.

Summerland Beach, O.
Woolley's Summerland Beach Camp Association opens August 10, and closes Sept. 1. S. J. Woolley, president, Milo, Ohio; I. Weldon, general manager.

Forest Home, Mich.
This camp is located at Snowflake, Mich., and opens August 3 and continues until August 25. For full information, address Anna M. Fox, Box 267, Mancelona, Mich.

South Boulder Canon, Colo.
Open three months, July, August and September, at South Boulder Canon, Colo. 27 miles from Denver. 90 cents for round trip from Denver. For particulars address Mrs. M. Taylor, Box 780, Denver, Colo.

Bankson's Lake, Mich.
At Bankson's Lake, Mich., commencing June 14 and ending June 30. For programme address Dr. D. O'Dell, Manager and Chairman, Paw Paw, Mich. John Stillwell, president.

Marshalltown, Iowa.
The Central Iowa Spiritualist Association will be held from August 24 to September 14 inclusive, at Marshalltown, Iowa. Inquiries should be addressed to E. M. Vail, president or Mrs. I. F. Andrews, corresponding secretary, Marshalltown, Iowa.

Wonewoc, Wis.
The Western Wisconsin Camp Association will hold their annual camp-meeting at Wonewoc, Wis., July 12 to 26 inclusive. A splendid program has been prepared. A cordial invitation to all. For full particulars, and illustrated programs, write Miss Gertrude Spooner, secretary, Wonewoc, Wis.

"The Attainment of Womanly Beauty of Form and Features," edited by Albert Turner. This book has for its object the cultivation of personal beauty, based on hygiene and health culture. It is the combined wisdom of twenty physicians and specialists. Every young lady in the land should read it. Every wife should peruse its pages. Every elderly woman should be familiar with its contents. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lilian Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. A book for the higher life. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1 For sale at this office.

"Heliocentric Astrology or Essentials of Astronomy and Solar Mentality, with Tables of Ephemeris from 1830 to 1910." By Yarmo Vedra. For sale at this office. Price $1.50.

"Woman, Church and State." A historical account of the status of woman through the Christian ages; with reminiscences of the Matriarchate. By Matilda Joslyn Gage. An important work for all women, students of history, etc. Paper, 75 cents. Cloth, gilt, $1.50. For sale at this office.

Famous Mathematical Argument

Reviewed and Demolished By Prof. J. S. Loveland.

I am more than gratified at your enterprise in finding the author of the chapter in the Arabula about which there was so much discussion. I knew that A. J. Davis was not the author, but who was I could not tell. But the authorship being settled, with your permission, I wish to submit a brief review of the argument advanced by the writer. He claims that his essay is a mathematical demonstration of the existence and universal activity of a personal Deity.

THE EXACT SCIENCE.

Everybody knows that mathematics is the exact science, therefore, if the argument is really a mathematical one, nothing further can be said. No one will deny that 2 plus 2 equals 4, nor that the whole is equal to the sum of all its parts. But have we any such demonstration in this article? I answer most emphatically, No! The author makes a most defiant challenge to anyone who should dare to controvert the logic of his contention. And yet I do not recollect ever reading anything more lacking in genuine logic than this effusion. Instead of being logical, it is a mass of rhetorical verbiage; and when you occasionally find a syllogism in form, it is completely vitiated by the fact that one of the premises is an unproved assumption. But, in this respect, he is at one with every person who has ever attempted to prove a Deific person. He rejects Paley's argument, and points out some of its defects, and then perpetrates the same defect. He says Paley does not prove the fact of creation. Neither does he. Both of them assume creation because proof is impossible, also because neither could commence their argument without such assumption. Paley's argument is far the ablest. It really includes our author's, but his cannot include Paley's, which embodies a purpose and the adaptation of means to accomplish that purpose. The fatal defect of Paley's argument is, in the assumption of the identity of mechanical and vital action. He assumed sameness in the construction of a watch and the evolution and action of a living being.

RESTS UPON ASSUMPTION.

Our author submits that his "argument assumes a bold tentative." That is emphatically true, for his argument, from beginning to end, rests upon assumptions which he does not prove, nor even attempt to prove. After submitting four statements as to the "true nature of causation," he lays down his basic assumption in the following terms: "Causation alone resides in mind; that matter never can be a cause; and therefore, that every phenomenon in the universe is, and ever must be, but the effect of intellectual force exerted by pure volition." In another place he states it thus: "All the motions of nature are strictly mathematical. Then must it follow as a conclusion utterly unassailable, that every effect in the universe is produced by the immediate agency of mind."

Now, if these propositions are admitted, there is no need, no room, for argument. It would be a needless waste of time. If every motion in nature; every tremor of every leaf on every tree in countless forests; if every ripple, on all the seas and lakes of the world; if every breeze, that stirs the air, and the endless motions of the millions of worlds in space, are "but the effect of intellectual force exerted by pure volition," then we have nothing to reply. We could only bow our heads and say, with W. J. Colville, "all is God at last." But we deny the assumption and demand the proof. Why is it not produced? Because there is none to produce. Is the mighty energy—Gravitation—which binds worlds and systems of worlds together, "intellectual force exerted by pure volition?" Is it pure volition which causes the stone to fall 16 feet in one second and twice as many the next? Is "intellectual force" in direct ratio to the amount and inversely to the square of the distance of bodies moved? These suppositions, absurd as they are on their face, must be accepted as truth if all causation resides in mind.

But this causative mind acts in a most unaccountable manner. To-day it causes a gentle ripple on the face of the ocean, and to-morrow a tidal wave sweeps homes and people to sudden destruction. One day, the sun shines from a cloudless sky, and the next a tempest sweeps over a doomed city engulfing millions of wealth and unknown hundreds of people. Beautiful harmony exists in the elements to-day, but to-morrow the cyclone desolates and kills. In one year, the seasonable rains cause plenty to abound, in the next they come not, and gaunt famine, with all its ghastly horrors, sweeps millions of starving wretches to most horrible deaths.

But these are "phenomena of nature," and are "but the effects of intellectual force exerted by pure volition," affirms our author. It is useless to swell the catalogue of analogous phenomena, or point to the fact that there is not one iota of evidence that they are the product of mental causation. On the contrary, the prima facie evidence, addressing both matter and intellect, proclaims material causation.

The writer assumes the absolute inertia of matter. But every one knows this to be false. All matter is in perpetual motion, so far as the whole is concerned, and only relative inertia can be affirmed of any particular part. And that every atom of material substance is in constant motion is, beyond all question, a fact.

CAUSATIVE FORCES.

But let us consider the phenomena of life, in the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Here is a vast field of phenomena. Here is motion, continuous, and perpetual in a relative sense. As illustrative, take the human organism. There is blood and nerve circulation—digestion—absorption—assimilation, growth and the repair of waste, etc. Our minds have nothing whatever to do with these numerous functions or motions of organic life. Our mental power is entirely dependent upon them, instead of being their cause. It is the saliva, gastric juice, gall and the pancreating secretions, and not mind, which are causative forces in digesting the food. And it is air and electricity which purify the blood in the lungs, and not mind, which has nothing to do directly with the action of these vital functions.

ACTION OF MIND.

But air is matter, not mind. If matter is, in the absolute sense, inert, that is dead, incapable of motion, in fact, possessing no properties of its own, then it must be mere unresisting stuff, which mind can use as it pleases (provided that one thing can act on another which possesses nothing in common therewith). Such is not the fact, for we find ourselves limited on every hand by the properties of matter. The rock has hardness and weight, which limit mind in many ways. Water is a necessity, but it will run down hill in spite of mind. It will quench thirst, fire and life itself if we are immersed therein. It will buoy our ships, or swallow them up, if greatly angered by the winds. Electricity blazes in the air, produces tremendous concussions, and tears trees and other objects in pieces. It produces varied and powerful effects. Is it inert? Is it mind? Has it no properties? If not a causating energy, what is it?

ACTION OF THE SUN.

Our Sun is the center of stupendous energy. It exerts a force equal to a horse power upon every square rod of the earth's surface, and lifts from that surface fifteen tons of water every year to a height of from two to five miles. It radiates a constant flow of light in every direction for hundreds of millions of miles. It is continually throwing immense masses of molten matter from a few thousand to two hundred thousand miles from its surface. The magnetic conditions of our earth are continually modified by the influence of the sun. It is the potent cause of these and many other effects. Is the sun mind, or matter? Does it exert intellectual volition? The common sense answer is this: The sun is a center of causative energy, and exerts that energy entirely independent of any mind in the universe. In fact, the vast field of causation is essentially that of physical substance, while that of pure mentality is very, very small.

MATHEMATICS ILLUSTRATED.

Let us now grapple with our author's mathematics, and, if I mistake not, we shall find his mathematical argument as shallow as his positions upon causation. I will state his positions in his own words.

"Proposition 1. The perception of mathematical truth evinces mind of a lofty order. Corollary: To evolve mathematical motions, or in plainer terms to work mathematically, evinces mind of a still loftier order. For to evolve mathematical motions unquestionably implies their perception. Nothing but mind can work mathematically."

In reply, I submit, that it is not true that "the perception of mathematical truth evinces mind of a lofty order," for every mind not semi-idiotic perceives such truth. That 2 plus 2 equal 4 is perceived almost universally. By the ignorant as well as the learned. That the whole is equal to the sum of all its parts, and is greater than any one of them are mathematical formulaes comprehended by all people. "To work mathematically" does not "evince mind of a still loftier order." Zerah Colburn, when a mere boy, could work out mathematical problems in a most wonderful manner, but he never evinced any superiority of mind, and when his education was attempted he lost his boyhood capacity for solving problems.

MUSIC.

Music is mathematical, according to our author, but the great musicians have not evinced any loftiness of mind except in their own specialty. Blind Tom was a musical prodigy, but is said to have been almost an idiot in other directions. Sir Isaac Newton, notwithstanding his mathematical genius, was extremely credulous and superstitious, as shown in his work on the prophecies. Zerah Colburn evidently did not comprehend the principles involved in his answers to the problems submitted to him for solution any more than do the children, who perform wonders on musical instruments with no instruction, comprehend the science of music.

BEEHIVE AFFORDS AN ILLUSTRATION.

Come with me to a bechive. Please observe the construction of the comb. No mathematician has ever been able to construct a series of cells of more perfect form for the utilization of space than does the honeybee. Here is mathematical motion and working; and here, according to our author, is mind of the "loftiest order." I can allow of no shuffling or dodging the issue. If there is any such thing as mathematical working, the honey-bee is the worker, and hence "evinces mind of the loftiest order!" Moreover, according to this Mathematical Demonstration, the bee is conscious of his capacity and comprehends the principles of mathematical working.

Let us apply another phase of our author's argumentation, or rather combine his causation and mathematical arguments together.

We are still at the beehive. The beautiful, mathematically formed comb is before us. Nothing more perfect for the purpose is possible. But it is an effect. A mathematical one. It must have a cause. That cause must be mind—mathematical mind. Where is it? Step forth, honey-bee. There is your cause! Your "lofty type of mind." And it is neither male nor female. It is a neuter.

But the comb is a perfect geometrical form, and it accomplishes two purposes. One, as before stated, secures the most usable room with the least waste of space. Every cell has the same number of sides, and for thousands of generations the honey-bee has always evolved the same perfect form. The other end secured, by this form, is the use of the least possible material in the construction of the comb-cells. This is an important item, for the cell material costs the bee much more labor than the honey stored therein. He thus makes his mathematics contribute to his economy. It saves labor.

ESSENTIALLY PERFECT.

Now, suppose we allow mind to the bee. Instead of being mind of the "loftiest order" it is the lowest. It is the instinctive instead of the reasoning mind. But, in its sphere it is essentially perfect. It never mistakes, and it never improves—never varies in its mode of working. Take the most profound mathematician, who had never seen the comb of the honey-bee, and require him to construct a series of cells with the greatest capacity and the smallest amount of material. How long would it take him to invent it? But the honey-bee does it as soon as born.

To work mathematically does not evince the "loftiest order of mind." For that type, we must look to Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Comte, Marx, Victor Hugo, Davy, Darwin and many others.

A GREAT LACK OF ARGUMENT.

In glancing over this production, one cannot fail to see that there is very great lack of argument even in form, but a great abundance of mere illustration which is dignified with the appellation of "Induction." This gives wide scope for the author's fertile rhetoric. One example will suffice as answer to the whole series of inductions. We will select chemistry as that example. He grows enthusiastic and eloquent over the definite proportions of chemistry. He analyzes a cup of water and finds the invariable "two to one in quantity and one to eight in weight" of hydrogen and oxygen in its composition, and fiercely denounces as the "moral felons" of the universe those who reject his hypothesis. In the air and limestone he finds the same law of definite proportion. But these well known facts of chemistry prove nothing in favor of his assumption of a mathematical god revealed to him in a Texas flower. Until he proves the fact of creation his whole article is a mass of meaningless verbiage. The "moral felons" say to him, there never was a creation. All substance is eternal. In it exists atoms, molecules, tendencies, forces, which necessitate motion, which, with attraction and repulsion, cause endless sucession of forms. In chemical combinations there can be no different proportion, from the fact that the shape and gravity of the atoms is such that no other is possible. The very nature and properties of the atom and molecule necessitates the precise union which occurs.

MERE CHANCE.

But, instead of answering the real proposition of the atheist, he disingenuously and falsely assumes that the atheist attributes all the wondrous phenomena of nature to mere chance. He knew, if he knew anything about the controversy, that every one, whom he terms "moral felons," was an advocate of eternal Order, and a denier of anything approximating chance. They affirm that the "Universe is a system of Perfect Order," which includes "Causes and Effects—Means and Ends—Instruments and Uses."

Dr. Holmes or Emerson say chance? No! Both said "Order." That is, his labored document simply set forth the orderly method in which the phenomena of the Cosmos occurred, as the result of the workings of eternal energy. His attempt to get round this rational position by a long calculation of chances is an absurd effort to escape a real difficulty and bolster up his fallacies by a loud outcry that Order doesn't do anything, and that law is not a force but a method. All intelligent persons know that strictly speaking law means method of doing, but they also know that the term is used far more frequently to express energy, and especially in the phrase "laws of nature," where it almost invariably signifies the forces of nature, instead of the mere order or mode of action. This statement of fact scatters to the winds his long dissertation upon law, and leaves intact the reply of Holmes and Emerson—"Order"—as a complete answer to his laborious rhetorical incubration.

IMPOSSIBILITY OF CREATION.

It would be germane to this review, to here introduce argument showing the impossibility of Creation. That, of itself, would be sufficient answer and refutation of the essay under consideration. But instead, I refer the reader to a recent article of mine in The Progressive Thinker demonstrating the absolute impossibility of Creation. Hence, without repeating the argument, I remark that it completely overthrows the main contention of our author, and leaves his article as a simple statement of the inherent, uncreated causation and mathematics of nature.

ONE OF ITS WEAKEST FEATURES.

But, as I purpose a thorough refutation of this much discussed essay, I call special attention to one of its weakest and most offensive features. I do not refer to the vindictive abuse of unbelievers, though that alone ought to consign any document to the waste basket, but to the defence of the god he discovered in a Texas flower and Plato's affirmation, "God Geometrises," in connection with the origin of evil. The question of evil is a sore one for all theists, but the assumptions of our author make the character of his god the most repulsive and detestable of all the creations of the human imagination. Let us recall some of his positions. "Causation alone resides in mind. Matter can never be a cause." Speaking of cause and effect he says: "The former (cause) is first, both in logic and chronology." Well, if God is the First Cause, he is the only real cause, for all secondary causes, if there be any such, are only the effect of the first or primal cause. They are only streams from the original fountain, hence the stream is only the fountain in another form, and in essence is the same. The character of the fountain can be perfectly known by that of the stream flowing therefrom.

Therefore, the only induction possible is, that God is the actual and responsible author of all evil. The fearful storm which wrecked Galveston was not the result of any combination and action of natural forces, "but the effect of intellectual force exerted by pure volution." The famines in India, which sweep off millions by the horrid process of starvation, are all "effects of the intellectual force" of God "exerted by pure volition." Our author's God, in fact, any Creative God, is a wholesale murderer of the creatures he has made. He is the author of all forms of crime, and all the degradation and savagery on the earth. Nothing exists but what originated in him. Devils, murderers, thieves, etc., bear his image as really as the tallest archangel in the Hierarchy of the Heavens.

THE PROBLEM OF EVIL.

How does our author dispose of these sweeping deductions from his own premises? Why, he holds up his hands in holy horror at the "blasphemy" of the "unprincipled atheist," who dare to urge the legitimate deductions from his own premises. He then attempts to escape the crushing force of these inferences by the subterfuge that they rest only against the character, but not the existence of a Deity. "The problem of evil," he says, "is demonstrably insolvable without a direct revelation from heaven, and for the obvious reason that the existence of evil is a contingent, not a necessary truth." Aha! "A contingent?" that is an accidental truth! It simply happened that evil came into the world! What an admission. And that too from the man posing as a logician, and as a mathematician calculating the impossibility of a chance combination of five petals in a great number of flowers, and then proclaiming the existence of moral evil a chance—an accident! Look in your Dictionary and study the meanings of the word "contingent," and apply them to this God, who is such a precise mathematician that he can't allow the slightest divergence from the exact number of five petals in the famous Texas flower, nor from the same number of atoms in each chemical combination, or fingers and toes on man; or eyes, ears, arms or legs, etc., etc. There is no contingency here—no chance happening. But when he came to the moral nature of man, where untold ages of agony, if not eternal torment in hell, was involved, by some sort of chance, or contingency, he allowed or decreed—caused moral evil or sin in man. The tears of woe that evil has caused would float all the navies of the world. The groans and sighs of agony would, if concentrated, drown the cannonade of Gettysburg or the Wilderness. And this God caused it all "contingently." What a God!

MORAL EVIL—ITS ORIGIN.

Another quibble is, that no one knows the reason why God caused moral evil. Not even a seraph can know or give the reason. It is sufficient answer to say that no seraphic insight is necessary, for plain common sense is equal to the emergency. The God who caused moral evil did so because it was part of his nature. Nothing can come from any being that is not in, and of, that being. Hence, the Christian God proclaims "I make good and create evil."

SOMETHING ABOUT SIN.

Our author then indulges in suppositions. Perhaps God created evil, and the consequent suffering, to enhance our future happiness. If we need sin to make our future more glorious, so does God also. Perhaps it was to create an opportunity to display his great mercy. Yes, indeed! Such a mercy. He plunges us into the filth and hell of sin in order to get the credit of taking us out on certain conditions. It is a wonderful mercy to help a man out of the ditch into which you have pushed him. But all the suppositions are the turnings and twistings of a man completely cornered by his own absurdities.

CHARACTER OF GOD.

But now let us analyze more closely the assumption that our positions only touch the character of the assumed God, but not the fact of his existence. God and his character are not two things. His character is the en semble of his nature. His attributes, or perfections, constitute his being. His character is himself. It is claimed that he is infinite in all the elements of his being; Omnipotent, Omniscient, Omnipresent, Immutable, Holy and Good. Infinite Goodness and Holiness could never cause evil and suffering. Immutability would mean the same "yesterday, to-day and forever." The same principles would rule in all time and all worlds. He could neither do, nor permit the doing of wrong.

But the whole trend of our author's argument reveals his God as allowing, causing and doing the wrong, he being the causating energy and "intellectual force" producing all things and motions in nature, and in perpetual conflict with himself. Evil existing in God must be eternal much more than with the atheist as he charges.

FORMS OF SELF-DELUSION.

But we advance one step farther with our argument, and submit that no being possessed of unity and perfection of nature can possibly antagonize itself. Light cannot become darkness. Cold cannot become heat, nor can truth become falsehood. Nothing can become its opposite. But the argument of our author proves, if it proves anything, that the infinite God is in perpetual conflict with himself, as he is made the producing cause of all that is, and all that happens; that is, of all substance and all phenomena or motion. But, this is impossible, in the very nature of things. It contradicts, and therefore destroys itself. Hence, his labored essay falls to the ground, and proves nothing but the fact that the human intellect is subject to the wildest forms of self-delusion.

THE CONCLUSION.

In concluding this article, let us sum up the argument. In the first place, I showed that the assumption that all causation resided in mind, and that no causating energy inhered in matter, was not proved. Was not even attempted to be proved, but rested on another unproved assumption that matter was inert. This was shown to be incorrect, and that the prima facie evidence declared that causative energy pertained to matter, and that mind was limited and controlled by matter. But, even if we allowed exclusive causation to mind, it would not prove our author's position, because there were many minds, and their motions entirely independent of each other, and there was no evidence that the many minds as causating centers originated from one mind as the first cause. Hence, it must be proved that there had been a creation sometime. But this has not been done, hence there could be no such thing as a first cause.

There can be no cause without an effect.

Cause is not first any more than positive is first or before negative.

It showed also that in the great processes of evolution effects transcended their causes. We reckon the greatness or importance of things by their functional capacities. Hence, taking animal life, from the amoebae to man, and the vegetable from the primal moss to the grandest tree of the forest or orchard, and the most beautiful flowers of the garden, and we have constant ascension from the less to the more perfect, or effects transcending their causes. Effects become causes.

Every living organism develops a germ which is a cause of another similar organism. Thus there is a constant play back and forth of cause and effect. And, until positive, historical creation is proved, we must allow the eternity of this process.

I then showed that the positions assumed as to the superiority of the mathematical mind were not true. That we find some of the most perfect forms of mathematical working by the instinctive powers of insects. And that some of the mathematical prodigies, like Zerah Colburn, were not distinguished by any mental superiority whatever. Also that the definite proportions in chemistry were simply and only the manifestation of the inherent forms and forces of the atoms and molecules composing the formation. In fact, that the whole mathematical order of the Cosmos proved nothing whatever as to any supposed origin of the same, but merely demonstrates that the properties and energies of matter are such that its organizations and motions must be just as they are. And the existence of mathematical order is a simple fact, proving nothing as to origin or end. And the fact that man can imitate some of nature's processes by using the substance and energy now existent, is no proof that some other mind created that substance and force. Hence, unless the absolute creation of substance and energy can be proved, all the phenomena of the Cosmos do not furnish one scintilla of evidence of the existence of a God. Hence, all the author's hysterical gushings over Plato's "God Geometrises," and the thousands of five-petaled Texas flowers are as destitute of logical demonstration as the insane claim of the hypnotized convert that he feels God in his soul.

But the crowning failure of our author's pretentious effort is found in his attempted solution of moral evil. I have shown how that arrays the divine perfections against themselves, and as that is an impossibility in itself, and yet the existence of evil affirming such impossibility, the unescapable inference is that the Cosmos could not be the creation of a perfect God. Hence, it furnishes no evidence whatever of the existence of such a being. On the contrary, the existence of a world with moral evil rife, is demonstration that no such God has an actual existence; for, if he had, he would essentially change the order of nature's workings.

As a last remark, I submit that the fact that this assumed demonstration is worthless, is evinced by the utter neglect of the same by all classes of thinkers. It fell dead from the press, while Paley's argument, though most defective, is still urged by nearly all theists.

Summerland, Cal. J. S. LOVELAND.

LOVE IS LIFE—GOD IS LOVE.

"Nothing useless is or low,
Each thing in its place is best,
And what seems but idle show
Strengthens and supports the rest."
—Longfellow.

With love cometh knowledge, oh, child of the earth,
She guards the sweet fountains of music and mirth,
She will lead thee where fountains of joy have their birth.

Oh, seek her then ever through labor and song,
And end the rude conflicts that hate would prolong,
'Tis love, and love only, can triumph o'er wrong.

Oh, the world knows not yet half the duty of love,—
It never has tasted the sweetness of love,
It dreams not, it feels not how holy is love.

"Love is life,"—"God is love," and the infinite source
Of all forms and impressions of beauty and force,
What mortals may hope then to trammel its course?

Love lays the foundation of worlds, and her hands
Form the billows of ocean to cradle the land,
And she buildeth the hills out of atoms of sand.

Love weaves the fair curtains looped up by the stars,
She maketh the swift winds and lightning her cars,
And the blossoming clouds of the morning are hers.

Love nothing despiseth, or counteth as vain,
What is, she improves, in her hand "love is gain."
E'en the smoke of a battle she turneth to rain.

Love thinketh no evil," she "seeks not her own,"
From the peasant who reaps to the king on his throne,
She exacts not her tithe till the harvest is grown.

Through ages unnumbered she reaps and she sows,
Then patiently waits till the blossoming rose
And the lilies of love all their beauty disclose.

The soil planted first in each bosom is self,
And its flowers are man's pleasures, its fruits are his pelf,
While justice and truth live in books on the shelf.

But, oh! 'twill be shown in the growth of each soul
That the highest self-love seeks the good of the whole,
And this heaven-born truth every act will control.

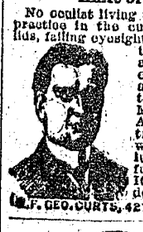
All hearts thus obeying her holy decree,
Will sing in earth's temples the songs of the free,
'Tis Love and Love only, can make the heart free.

BELLE BUSH.

We should avoid whatever may display bad feeling, and attend, with civility to what may be addressed to us; all hearts are conciliated by politeness and affability.—Socrates.

The natural rights of men, civil and political, are liberty, equality, security, property, social protection, and resistance to oppression. Liberty consists in the right to do whatever is not contrary to the rights of others.—

The church still talks about "evidence," about "reason," about "freedom of conscience" and the "liberty of speech," and yet denounces those who ask for evidence, who appeal to reason, and who honestly express their thoughts.—Ingersoll.



It is nature to communicate one's self; it is culture to receive what is communicated as it is given.—Goethe.

The acknowledgment of weakness which we make in imploring to be relieved from hunger and temptation is surely wisely put in our prayer.—Thackeray.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

Being all the Gospels, Epistles, and other pieces now extant, attributed, in the first four Centuries to Jesus Christ, his apostles and their companions, and not included in the New Testament by its compilers. Price, cloth, $1.50.

THE SOUL OF THINGS;

Or Psychometric Researches and Discoveries. By Wm. and Elizabeth M. F. Denton. A marvelous work. Though concise as a text book it is as fascinating as a work of fiction. The reader will be amazed to see the curious facts here combined in support of this power of the human mind, which will resolve a thousand doubts and difficulties, make geology plain as day, and throw light on all subjects now obscured by time. Price, $1.50. In three volumes, cloth bound, $1.50 each. Postage, 10c per copy.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

Inspirational lecturer in German open for engagement. Write to Julius Kuhn, No. 803 North Carnac street, Philadelphia, Pa., for full particulars.

A wealthy woman named Silva, recently died at Lisbon, Portugal, and left her entire property to a "rooster." She was a fervid Spiritualist, a believer in the transmigration of souls, and imagined that the soul of her dead husband had entered the "rooster." She caused a special fowl house to be built and ordered her servants to pay extra attention to their "master's" wants. The disgust of her relatives over the will caused the story to become public, and a lawsuit might have followed had not one of the heirs adopted the simple expedient of having the wealthy "rooster" killed, thus becoming himself the next of kin.

A few weeks ago Mrs. Hamilton Gill of Chicago, visited Cincinnati, Ohio, and Newport, Ky. Her uncle, Jonathan Barnes, of Newport, one of the captains of Spiritualism, although more than 81 years old, is still hale and hearty, and went with Mrs. Gill to the Thursday night meeting of the First Society of Spiritualists at their temple in Newport. This is a beautiful building and one the Spiritualists of Kentucky may well be proud of. There was a large attendance. Mrs. Gill, Mr. Brooks and other mediums spoke and gave tests. On the way home Mrs. Gill stopped off at Marion, Ind., and visited her brother, Charlie Barnes, his wife and mother, Mrs. Cromwell. Mrs. Cromwell, of Marion, is another old worker in the cause of truth and a very good medium. Mrs. Hamilton Gill has now returned to Chicago and her Sunday and Thursday evening meetings will be continued at her residence, 665 West Adams street, until further notice.

G. W. Kates and wife will accept calls for grove meetings June 20 to July 30 at any point in the West they can reach. They will attend the Kansas State Association convention in Topeka, June 6 to 10. Address them there at 1255 Clay street.

A correspondent writes us that G. W. Kates and wife held six interesting and successful meetings in Macomb, Ill., May 21 to 25. The attendance grew larger each evening; and on Sunday, at the Fair Grounds, grove meetings were held with audiences much greater in numbers than had been anticipated. The weather cleared warm on purpose for our success. The lectures and descriptions held the large audiences in close attention and have awakened much interest in Spiritualism. The cause as represented by these missionary exponents was new here, but now has a firm hold upon the people. They started a local society which we trust will have active support.

Will C. Hodge has returned from the Pacific Coast and is now located in Chicago. He can be addressed at 40 Loomis street.

E. B. Sargent writes from Haverhill, Mass.: "Hudson Tuttle's book, 'The Religion of Man,' will place in my possession the nine premium books which money could not buy from me if I could not procure another set. I owe you a debt of gratitude." The above is from an octogenarian, who has prospects of becoming a centenarian.

Mrs. L. D. Shery writes: "Your book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, received, and also The Progressive Thinker. The Progressive Thinker is a welcome visitor in my home. I don't know how anyone who believes in the beautiful teachings of the Spiritual philosophy can get along without reading it."

Mrs. Marlhouse Mallen, who died at Twin Lakes, Colo., a few days ago, was a decidedly picturesque figure in Colorado mining life. She came to this state in 1879 and began prospecting in man's attire. She carried a six-shooter and worked alone in the mountains. Mrs. Mallen built a cabin on the crest of Free Gold Hill at an altitude of 9,000 feet and staked out a number of claims near there. She did all her own work, tunneling into the mountain, drilling, blasting, timbering, etc. In 1893 she sold a claim for $3,000 and went to the World's Fair in Chicago. She spent the money inside of twenty days, and while at the exposition slapped and bumped together the heads of two Columbian Guards, who had criticised her mode of dress. She was a Spiritualist and always claimed that the spirits showed her where to locate her claims.—Chicago American.

Sunday, May 23, the Hearst publications, including the New York Journal, Chicago American, and San Francisco Chronicle, published as a musical supplement, the second of their songs, illustrating the comic characters made famous by their cartoonists, entitled "Foxy Grandpa." The words are by Byron D. Stillman, and the music by Victor Vogel, of Chicago, both well known to many of our readers, and authors of the poupular song, entitled "Happy Hooligan," which appeared a few weeks ago in these papers, and of which we made mention at the time. We are glad to announce this, their second success, in bringing these famous characterizations out in song. The song is a very clever creation, both words and music, and especially well adapted for the home circle. Those wishing copies of one or both songs can obtain them at 10 cents a copy each, by addressing Stillman & Vogel, writers of songs, sketches and monologues, 4916 Champlain avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Laura B. Payne writes from Topeka, Kans.: "I will start to Texas about the middle of June to serve that state as missionary, and would be pleased to hear from those points where such work is needed, both in Oklahoma and Texas. Terms easy. Please let me hear from you who are interested in the cause."

There will be an Indian Pow-Wow and Picnic given in honor of and conducted by Chief Red Jacket, the control of G. V. Cordingly, at Reissig Grove, Riverside, Saturday (all day) June 7. Tickets, 35 cents; children, 15 cents. Directions to grounds: Take Metropolitan Elevated (Garfield Park) to Forty-eighth street; change for LaGrange street cars, which stop at the gate; grounds can also be reached by the Lake Street Elevated. A prize will be awarded for the best Indian costume. All are invited to take part. In case of rain there is plenty of shelter. All those who sell 25 tickets will be presented with a round trip ticket to the camp-meeting.

Rev. W. H. Van Allen, of Elmira, N. Y., attacked Spiritualism in a most violent manner. He was ably answered by Mrs. Von Kanzler, who is lecturing in that city.

Mrs. Celia M. Pine, of Jersey City, N. J., writes interestingly of a black cat which appeared mysteriously when a patient was about to die: "My mother went to see my grandmother, who was at that time matron of an asylum for the insane. I think it was in Yorkville. Dr. McDonald was in charge. John Jacob Astor's son was insane there; also Dr. Donald's brother. The asylum was a long way from our home, in the lower part of New York, and mother stayed over night. Before retiring, grandmother left her alone while she went to the kitchen. Mother thought it would be less lonesome to sit in the hall, so she went there. As the door blew shut she could not open it, there being a spring lock on it, and her mother carried the keys. She could not run when she saw a very large cat coming towards her. The cat did not seem to take any notice of her, but stopped two doors below, and disappeared. When her mother came back she told her what she had seen. Instead of being surprised she said: 'Oh! that cat always comes when there is a death in this ward.' She and mother went at once to the room into which the cat disappeared, and where there was a crazy squaw who had been sick. She always slept sitting up with the blanket over her head. When grandmother removed the blanket she found the poor old woman dead. Grandma was matron there for twelve years, and the black cat never failed to be on hand, and no one could find out what became of it, for it never came out after it went in a room."

Mrs. Geo. Pooler writes from Sheridan, Ill.: "We have no organization here, but we are going to try to have a nice little camp, and try to make some converts—not to our faith or belief, but to our knowledge. We have as pretty a camp ground as there is in this State or any other. We have as nice a class of people who patronize us as can be found. We do not tolerate frauds or fakes for a moment."

Flowers instead of water were the main features of a christening ceremony in Englewood. The christening occurred in Hopkins' hall, 528 West Sixty-third street. The affair was under the auspices of the Englewood Spiritual Union. Rev. Harry J. Moore officiated. Four girl infants were christened by being crowned with roses and carnations. The hall was crowded with interested spectators. "While our custom is not of recent adoption, it is new and novel to the generality of people," said Mr. Moore in talking of the services. "It is not often that so many children are presented at one time for floral christening. The christening of one child at a time arouses no special comment."—Chicago Chronicle.

W. F. Ruffle writes: "We will hold our first anniversary services in our new quarters, hall 220, 26 East Van Buren street, Athenaeum Building, on Sunday, June 8, and will be ably assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Elmo and others. Miss Dollie Lasher will preside as usual at the piano. We look forward to a large attendance and a good spiritual downpour from the realms of light and love."

The morning Dispatch of Erie, Pa., says: "One week ago Sunday, in Grand Army hall, speaking to his audience of spirit-believers and skeptics, Frank T. Ripley said: 'My guide tells me to make the prediction that within a few days one of England's greatest lords will pass over.' Saturday the wires brought the news that Lord Pauncefote died in Washington. Here was the quick fulfillment of a prediction. Mr. Ripley talked again in the same hall last night. When asked about the prophecy and its realization so startling, said: 'I had no idea who the victim would be. In fact, I did not ask my guide. He told me to say what I did. I believed him and was not at all surprised when I heard of the passing away of the ambassador.' Mr. Ripley spoke on The Religion of the Future. He said that in ten years from now members of the orthodox churches will be asking their ministers for proof of their assertions. 'Give us some thread of evidence. The issue is too mighty to accept on faith alone. The future is dark; we must have some light that is positive. None of you show us anything or prove any of your statements about the life everlasting. Science has disproved the Adam and Eve story. It could never have happened. If we never had first parents and they (of course) never sinned, as told in the scriptures, what, then, was the need of a savior to atone for that sin which was never committed?'"

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Wanted—A coplete list of all speakers and mediums located in Ohio, with phase of work carried on. Will all readers of The Progressive Thinker kindly send what information they can to aid the State Committee in their work? Albert W. Wadsworth, president, 95 Cedar avenue, Cleveland, Ohio.

S. Hough writes from Allegheny, Pa.: "And just here I want to say you are doing wonders with your paper and premiums. It is true that I have but little patience with a few of the writers who insist upon being tied to the dead past, by their use of 'Rev.', 'church,' etc., but I will stand it rather than miss the many good things."

C. H. Mathews writes: "In the U. S. Senate, May 21, 1902, Mr. Wellington (Md.) opposed the pending Philippine measure and said the action of the United States in the islands was as indefensible as the 'attack of the hordes of hell upon God.' He truthfully declared that 'above the army and the president and the war department, were the American people, and, in his judgment they were responsible for the condition of affairs in the Philippines, because they had placed the dollar above the man.' The time when 'the attack of the hordes of hell upon God' was made, does not appear in my King James' version of the Bible. However, had Elijah the prophet been there, he might have let "fire come down from heaven and consume thee and thy fifty."—II. Kings, 1:10. In that event, I don't think the 'hordes of hell' would have cut much of a figure in a fight with God. But, these good Christians must settle this matter among themselves. It is not our funeral."

Henry H. Nichols writes from San Jose, Cal.: "Slowly but surely the army is advancing. Good reports come to us from San Francisco and Oakland, of many meetings which are well attended. Good reports also come from the southern part of the state. Many speakers and mediums are employed throughout the state. San Jose has one society, known as the First Spiritual Union. There are private meetings held in many parts of the city. This society will always be under obligations to Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie. Her weekly visits to our hall become a love feast to all. The Pioneers and G. A. R. people had her speak at their gatherings. Her kind and sympathetic words won many friends. The first of June she starts on an eastern trip to be gone until fall, visiting the camps in the different states. Saturday evening we are to give her a token of our friendship and a God-speed on her way to eastern friends. Now, about Spiritualism in a general way, and its standing in California. It is a wilderness or a great barren plain, a few cottages here and there. In the largest cities there are societies, but hundreds of small towns are without a spiritual thought, much less a society. Many towns of a few thousands of inhabitants have no society, and scarcely a spiritual paper taken; not a missionary at work. It is all answered in one word—lack of organization. All manner of isms are being taught from the spiritual camp, from reincarnation down; signs and wonders and mysteries, etc., from 10 cents to $2.50; soul culture in all of its stages; lessons from 10 cents to $25. It is too big a mud-hole to wade through, so I will not attempt it. Let us by common-sense win the respect of the world. Our state board is doing something in the right direction, and hope to do much more. As a member of the board I shall try to have made a good report to the National Convention next fall. In the absence of Mrs. Gillespie, our society has employed Mrs. E. B. Marcene, an old Spiritualist, a lady of ability and a good speaker. We expect much of her."

E. W. Sprague and wife, missionaries for the N. S. A., have the following camp-meeting engagements for the coming season: Vicksburg, Mich., Aug. 3 to 8; Haslett Park, Mich., Aug. 9 to 15; Grand Ledge, Mich., Aug. 16 to 22; Ashley, Ohio, Aug. 30 to Sept. 7. They have the month of July free and would like to hear from parties wishing their services as speakers and platform test mediums, either at camps or in the missionary field. Address 618 Newland Avenue, Jamestown, N. Y.

Mrs. E. J. Demorest writes from 300 Bissel street, Chicago: "On my way from Reading to Chicago, I called to see the First Society or First Church of Spiritualists. I now perceive as I look at the certificate I received some time since from that church, being one of the few who struggled for the liberty a state and national charter gives. I was glad to find its noble workers governed by the law of love, and where love is, there is harmony. As I entered the vestibule I knew there was progression. A card facing the entrance read, "The Progressive Thinker can be gotten here,' and I knew it was well with the people, for wherever I have read that notice, if only from the window of a railroad car far from a city or town, just where two or three are gathered, asking for the highest possible good for humanity, mental liberty, a great wave sweeps over me, and I find myself in touch with a universal expression of soul-growth; that is sunshine, air and food for the soul and body for all who read The Progressive Thinker."

R. M. Pritchett writes from Dana, Ill.: "Mrs. S. E. Pemberton, the noted trumpet medium of Bloomington, Ill., lately visited at the homes of Mrs. Luning and Mrs. Geo. Drummet, and during the week was constantly busy holding family circles in the evening, and private seances during the day. Her visit here awakened much interest among the people and many who were skeptical were well pleased with the results and seem satisfied of the genuineness of her mediumship while some of the leaders of orthodoxy who did not witness any of her work denounce her as a fraud and cry devil! Oh! but what that poor old fellow has to bear!"

Geo. Friend writes from Toledo, Ohio: "Spiritualism has become very inactive at the present time in this city. The Independent Association has closed its meetings on Sunday, May 25, until the first Sunday in September, on account of hot weather, which usually prevails at that period of the year. The association is gradually on the increase, both from a social and financial standpoint. We have given employment to a number of speakers and mediums and have distributed among them several hundred dollars, and they in return have distributed the light and knowledge among the people; and here we wish to say that Spiritualists in general should feel proud of the grand workers in the cause of truth. Mr. Fred D. Dunakin, of Cecil, Ohio, who was the speaker through the closing month, may be characterized as a man of high intellectual and moral attainments and a fearless advocate in the cause of the grand phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism. The message work during the month was given by Mrs. Lizzie Dowd, who did exceedingly well considering her very limited work in public. The meetings in September will be continued by Mrs. J. A. Murtha, of Baltimore, Md."

Some one from St. Louis, Mo., has ordered sent out a large number of copies of the Religion of the Future, but fails to give his name or street number. Will he please do so at once, as we have something of importance to communicate to him?

G. H. Brooks writes from 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill.: "I am engaged to speak at the Grand Ledge Camp, from August 2d to the 8th, and trust my many old friends in Michigan will take note and attend this camp, so that we may meet once more. It has been many years since I have spoken in Michigan, and it is with much pleasure I look forward to the meeting of many old friends. I am still at my home in Wheaton, and will respond to calls for funerals, and now and then a Sunday lecture during the summer."

Secretary writes: "The Lynn (Mass.) Spiritualists Association, having closed its meetings in Cadet Hall, will open grove meetings at Unity Camp, on June 1. Meetings will be held at this camp every Sunday until September 28. A grand union meeting will be held June 15, at which delegations will be present from Boston, Haverhill, Lowell, Methuen, Salem, Newburyport, Waltham, Malden, Stoneham and other surrounding towns. Mrs. S. C. Cunningham and many of our best speakers will be present. Unity Camp is situated in the town of Saugus, in one of the most beautiful pine groves in the state, and is easy of access from Boston and all other neighboring towns. A barge will run from Cliftondale to the camp to convey passengers from Boston. Refreshments are served on the ground."

"A Friend of Truth" writes from New Philadelphia, Ohio: "The injustice and unfairness of the secular press towards Spiritualists and Free Thinkers, and all who do not endorse their religious dogmas, is proverbial. Accordingly, I notice an article published in Milwaukee, Cincinnati, Canton and Massillon, Ohio, papers, which plainly illustrates how base-minded men sometimes recant Spiritualism. It appears that Mrs. Carrie A. Bigler, late of Milwaukee, Wis., though for 25 years the very worthy and devoted wife of Mr. John Simon Bigler, has filed her petition for divorce and alimony against her said husband, alleging extreme cruelty, neglect, and most brutal treatment as a cause. They were both ardent Spiritualists, Mr. B. acting as president of a Spiritualist society in Milwaukee, and proclaiming himself 'a Spiritualist from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet.' Now, in order to prejudice his said wife's case before the courts, he states the infelicity of the home to be due to his wife's strange belief; pictures himself as the rich and injured husband, etc. To the writer's own personal knowledge, Mr. Bigler, after a flat failure in business in Ohio, nearly 20 years ago, was only enabled to betake himself to Cincinnati, Ohio; thence to Milwaukee, and obtain a fair business through the proceeds of the sale of Mrs. Bigler's own home, used to bridge over the chasm of his necessities. Now Spiritualism, forsooth, is alleged as the cause of his misfortune, and lustful brutality, vile and degrading, is not a factor in the proceeding. Had these parties been members of one of the orthodox churches, there would have been less grand stand eclat attending its publication."

A. Curtis, of this city, writes: "I beg to announce the marriage on May 28, of Mr. Richard Stein to Miss Sadie Zayicek. Mr. Stein was president of the Progressive Society for the past year. The pastor of the Progressive Society, Mrs. Hilbert, officiated at the wedding, it taking place at the home of the parents of the bridegroom, the residence being tastefully decorated for that occasion."

Mrs. M. Bitters writes from Rochester, Ind.: "We note with pleasure the success of Harry J. Moore in Chicago. We were favored by a visit from him some days ago, at which he gave a short and instructive talk to our society. We are still working for Spiritualism and although our society has weakened by the going away of our late president, yet with the return of Mr. Moore in October, we hope to thrive again and yet do much good for our cause."

Arthur F. Milton is the author of some very excellent Psychic Essays. They were written through the mediumship of A. F. Melchers, of Charleston, S. C.

C. J. Barnes, trumpet medium, will be in Akron, Ohio, for a week or more on his way to the Lily Dale camp. He will be glad to stop off en route where desired.

Rev. C. Hall Cook, Ph. D., of Los Angeles, who has lectured several months at Albuquerque, New Mexico, is now delivering a series of lectures at Pueblo, Colo., in Riverside Hall. His general theme is Psychical Research or Demonstration of the Life Hereafter. Large audiences are in attendance. Dr. Cook's present address is 124 E. Evans Avenue, Pueblo, Col.

Mrs. Nettie M. Wood writes from Houston, Texas: "Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley has proven herself in the South what she is known to be in the North, a faithful, tireless worker for the advancement of Spiritualism. She has visited Fort Worth, Hillsboro, Waco, Houston and Galveston, and confirms the record which Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates established for the Texas State National Association of Spiritualists that we are to keep a high standard of philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism before the public. The world is ready for spirit truth such as Modern Spiritualism has, and is ready to recognize the same and to organize for its support if we but place an attractive element in the field. We need refined, educated people who have been touched by the angel inspiration, who understand what they are teaching and can explain the phenomena which comes through them. Mrs. Cooley is thoroughly up to this standard, and we are glad to have her in the state. She will visit Flatonia, San Antonio, Austin and Dallas before her engagement ends and make the friends there rejoice because of the knowledge which is ours."

Frank T. Ripley is engaged at Summerland Beach Camp-meeting, as chairman, lecturer and test medium; also at Ashley (Ohio) Camp in the same capacity. He has the Sundays of June not taken. Address him in care of General Delivery, Columbus, Ohio.

Mrs. R. J. Graham writes: "A large gathering of mediums and Spiritualists was held at Lakeside Hall, Thursday evening, May 29, and some of the talent on that occasion was a credit to the cause of Spiritualism, as in the case of the medium, Mrs. Maggie Waite, who gave her evidence of the continuity of life in her clear-cut, concise manner, never making a mistake. Mrs. C. B. Bliss, of Boston, the materializing medium, demonstrated that phase of mediumship, although public materialization is never very satisfactory, yet under the circumstances did very nicely. Sam Foss gave several communications, which were well received. He was preceded by his mother, Mrs. May Elmo, who also gave some good tests. Harry J. Moore was also called upon, and gave, as he always does, an eloquent talk on materialization. This young man has an excellent future before him, as he believes the philosophy and phenomena should go hand in hand. Mrs. E. J. Demorest was also present, and one of the first workers on the programme. She is a pleasing speaker. A piano selection was given by J. A. Bliss. The evening ended by slate-writing by Mr. Elmo. Those getting communications were pleased. G. V. Cordingley also gave tests and acted as chairman. The hall was filled at 50 cents admission; proceeds taken for the benefit of the Illinois State Camp-meeting."

Rev. W. F. Schulze, inspirational speaker, and Fannie E. Schulze, reliable inspirational and trance medium, are now open for an engagement in some Spiritualistic society. Early correspondence solicited. Address Rev. W. F. Schulze, N. P., Block, Room 19, Fargo, N. D.

Lucy S. Carroll writes from Wheeling, W. Va.: "I am glad that the discussion of educational matters has come to a close. I want to see harmony. Let our good brother, Moses Hull, do the work, and do it his own way, for he is able; one who can define the Bible as he does, can take charge of a college. He did a great good here. His books have been a revelation. One man, a Baptist, says: 'Two In One' is worth more to me than all the orthodox sermons I have heard all my life. I now understand the Bible.' I do hope to have him back with us again."

POINTS FOR ATTENTION

Of Illinois Spiritualists and the N. S. A.

As an officer of the Illinois State Spiritualists Association, I have read with interest our genial Brother G. W. Kates' impression of the Prairie State field. I am a great admirer of the grit of himself and wife, and believer in the lasting value of their work. It is to be regretted that they gave notice so shortly in advance of their coming that they had any considerable time for our state. There was hardly opportunity to herald their approach in a single issue of The Progressive Thinker before they were within our borders. Let me acknowledge, in passing, receipt from them of a memorandum of workers at various points in Illinois. That list, however, furnishes the only suggestion I have ever heard that Brother Kates consults tombstones, for in it he wants the State Association to get in communication for camping purposes with Leonard Juckett, at Fulton, Ill. Now Brother Juckett has been dead already some two years, and his last known postoffice address was Clinton, Iowa, on whose camp ground he passed out. However, mention of him as available at this time was undoubtedly due to overheated zeal.

We agree with Brother Kates that Illinois is a glorious state, settled, in the main, by a grand people. We doubt the accuracy of his conclusions that auxiliaries in a hundred towns are an immediate possibility, for we know something of the responses made to private and published opportunities extended by the State Board. The latter body is pleased to have its own diagnosis confirmed by so eminent a specialist as Brother K. when he says that the crying need in our state is for missionaries. The idea of a missionary upon every railroad artery radiating from Chicago has been advocated in print and on the platform by our board, but the mass of our people have not yet awakened to its importance and made contributions that warrant its undertaking. Two difficulties attend missionary work: Those most willing to undertake it are not best fitted for it by natural adaptability and lack of financial backing to properly sustain desirable workers. Another hindrance of lesser consequence, is recognized by Brother K. in the lack of neighborhood readiness for the coming of the evangelist. That cause hampered President Barrett greatly on his last western trip. Local workers must learn to get ready for desirable talent when it is available, or else blame only themselves if they go without such visitation.

Spiritualists of Illinois, are you ready to contribute towards sustaining missionaries in your own state?

Brother Kates touches upon a very tender point when he says the State Association should get the Watseka Society to transfer itself from the National to the former association. Had the business methods in the secretary's office of the N. S. A. been what they should have been, or the official board of the N. S. A. been wholly loyal to auxiliary state associations, Watseka would not have been granted a charter by the N. S. A. It was issued after the state association had been given exclusive jurisdiction in Illinois, as announced at the Handel Hall meeting of 1898 by N. S. A. officials then present. I also understand from a letter on my files from Secretary Woodbury that the N. S. A. board voted a charter to the Illinois State Association prior to issuance of one to the society at Watseka. Please look it up, Sister Longley. Ohio appears to have a similar grievance.

Either the N. S. A. should cease chartering auxiliary state associations, or else keep out of their territory after their organization and during their good behavior.

Notes of Persons, Places and Work.

This beautiful city just across the bay from San Francisco, is a center of spiritual activities, there being no less than four regular Sunday meetings held. Mr. Van Luven, who is working earnestly and hopefully to see the materialization of a spiritual temple; Mr. Ellis, who conducts the meeting at Fraternal Hall; and Mrs. R. Cowell, who holds forth at Loring Hall, are each having fine audiences, while Ada Foye is conducting an independent meeting in Maccabees' Hall, with her usual success. It has been my good fortune to be associated for a time with Mrs. Cowell, who is not only an earnest worker, but is one of the best platform test mediums to be found in any locality.

Spiritualism is more than holding its own on the Pacific coast and this, too, without special organization. The work has been accomplished mainly by individual effort, and is spreading in spite of divided forces and in spite of the fakir element which has brought much discredit and reproach upon our philosophy, for there are many faithful mediums and speakers who are true to themselves, their spirit helpers and the cause they represent.

Please do not infer, kind reader, that because of the above expressions the writer does not believe in the desirability and necessity of organization as well as a proper education for the work. We cannot be too well equiped for the work in hand and, while we are making wondrous strides through individual effort, very much more might be accomplished by thorough organization of our forces.

I have had the pleasure of meeting with N. F. Ravlin, who is now establishing a home in Fruitvale, a beautiful suburb of Oakland; as well as Dr. Phelon, formerly of Chicago, who is greatly interested in the work of the Hermetic Brotherhood; also Mr. Newman, the genial editor of the Philosophical Journal, and last but not least, have paid a visit to the "California philosopher," Charles Dawbarn, at his beautiful home in San Leandro. Brother Dawbarn will not need to change worlds to find beautiful surroundings, as his present home is in every sense an ideal one. Surrounded by the most beautiful flowers, fruit trees of every description, a garden which is his especial pride, and his chickens, he finds the condition of harmony which is very helpful in the production of articles which from time to time have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker.

There are many pleasant and desirable features in this California land and climate, and for some time your scribe has "been on the fence" hardly knowing whether to remain here another year or return to the "Windy City," with all its noise, smoke and dirt and its abundant life, with perhaps a little the strongest leaning toward Chicago.

WILL C. HODGE.

Ohio State Convention.

At Columbus, Ohio, on May 23, 24 and 25 occurred the annual convention of Spiritualists for the state, Mr. Thomas Black, of Cleveland, presiding, and Mr. John C. Hemmeter, secretary.

The day sessions Friday and Saturday were devoted to business entirely. The reports of the various officers showed about twenty-six societies working under charter, but only six of them who had responded in paying up the per capita tax. On account of lack of funds and support, no active work had been attempted or carried out the past year, and less than one hundred dollars expended as a state organization; however, all bills were paid, and no outstanding obligations. Considerable discussion of the field was had regarding the need of work and the possibilities for the coming year.

The newly elected officers for the ensuing year are as follows: Dr. Albert W. Wadsworth, Cleveland, president; J. F. Duniken, Cecil, O, first vice-president; Mrs. Hattie Webster, Columbus, second vice-president; John C. Hemmeter, Cleveland, secretary; Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran, Toledo, treasurer, and Miss Alice Thompson, Springfield, A. P. Oliver, Ashley; J. J. Beard and L. A. Grove, of Columbus, trustees.

Considerable interest was aroused and determination expressed to do active work; new members were received and some money raised to commence work.

By way of programme, on Friday evening, Dr. Wadsworth delivered an address on organization, which was well received. Saturday evening Mr. Willard Hull, of Columbus, delivered one of his characteristic addresses to an appreciative audience. Sunday morning Mr. D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, gave an address, followed by spirit messages by Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran.

At one o'clock the funeral services of Mrs. Rosa Spence were held from the church, conducted by Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, which seemed to add to the impressiveness of the convention.

On account of this the afternoon meeting was changed and short addresses were given by retiring President Black and President Wadsworth, Secretary Hemmeter and Mrs. Laura G. Fixen, of Chicago; also a recitation by Master Jason Hemmeter, of Cleveland, a twelve-year-old Spiritualist.

Sunday evening the address was by Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, followed by spirit messages from herself and Mrs. Hatfield Pettibone, of St. Louis, all of which were exceptionally fine and well received.

The weather was stormy, and yet the meetings were well attended and the general feeling was that the convention was the best one held and would result in good work. The meetings were held in the First Spiritual Church corner of State and Sixth streets, and the music of the convention furnished by their choir, and was a great inspiration to all. Next year the convention will be held at Toledo.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE,

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

A. C. F., New Haven: Q: I have a sister in the spirit world who died when she was an infant. She is now a woman, old enough to woo, wed, and be blessed with one of the greatest blessings heaven can bestow, viz., to have children of her own.

She can woo, and wed, but how is she going to have the sacred want supplied, the desire to have children of her own?

There are millions of persons who die before maturity, thus depriving them of ever being blessed with children of their own. How is this want to be supplied?

A. This question arises from the affirmation that spiritual existence begins with the individual on this earth, which is made by Spiritualists who carry the doctrine of evolution into the realm of spirit. If the time-old theory of pre-existence is accepted, then we are fancy free to imagine any phase of life in that infinite past, and if there be added thereto reincarnation, then the spirit may return clad in flesh, pass through each and every experience possible to conceive.

But is all this necessary for happiness or development? Can the question of this correspondent be answered on the plane of the evolution of spirit by and through one mortal existence?

It has been said, and truly, that there is neither marriage nor giving in marriage in the angel world. In that world the selfish forms of love are supplanted by the broad affections which know little distinction between children of its own and children of others.

As one-fifth of the population of civilized countries die in early childhood, there is no lack of children in the spheres. They are cared for by spirits of relatives gone before, or by those who enjoy this mission work. The mother-love, and yearning, loses its intensity when the necessities of this life which call this saintly faculty into activity, pass from its sphere, or better, broaden into the love for all. With these considerations there would arise no tangible reasons why the motherly instinct should not be gratified to the fullest and the occasion continue as long as the want is felt.

It is true the maternal instinct of ownership; the selfish pride in the superiority of one's own, comes not into this spiritual relation, and belonging as it does to the animal life, held in common with brutes, it passes with that condition and instead of contributing to spiritual excellence, too often is a detriment and degradation. But all the higher aspirations of the mother's heart are gratified in the spirit life, and all the joys, and none of the disappointments of the earthly mother are hers.

The mother instinct, of ownership, protection and excessive care, which this correspondent suggests as essential, as a life experience, is in many instances in this life deficient or entirely wanting. The instinct depends on the physical causes which make it a part of the scheme for the preservation of the race. This is illustrated in the animal world. The tiger will sacrifice life for its young, but when these offspring go forth to care for themselves they are forgotten for the next helplings wanting her care. Birds feed their young until fledged and able to fly from the nest, and there maternal instinct ends. Many persons are entirely deficient in this maternal feeling, their thoughts being drawn in other directions, and others by their affections going out to all children, show the widest extension of this faculty, and its application in the next life.

J. A. French, J. W.: Q. (1) On what is Free Masonry founded? Where first instituted; by whom and when?

A. The present name Free and Accepted Mason, with the ceremonies and government date back no further than the beginning of the eighteenth century, yet it must not be inferred that Freemasonry originated at such recent times. When first instituted, or by whom, is absolutely unknown. It undoubtedly preserves the last vestige of the Eleusinian mysteries, the grand religious system of the pagan world before the dawn of Christianity.

These were established in Greece at least 1000 years before our era. The Essenians were a weak branch with peculiar national modifications.

The story of the Masonic fraternity founded at the building of Solomon's temple, with the phraseology this made appropriate, is modern attempt to give a new garb, acceptable to Christians, to the old forms.

In an age of densest ignorance, without books or any means of gaining knowledge except orally; surrounded by enemies, it was of great benefit for selected persons to band themselves together, under sacred vows of mutual protection, and protection of those dependent, as wives and daughters, and by mystic ceremonies instruct in the most profound morality. In these brotherhoods the priests and rulers led, and the societies excited the most powerful influence over the destinies of the ancient nations; nor is its present power to be underestimated. The Masonic fraternity of the world numbers 3,000,000. Widely varying as are the rites of seventy-nine different national and racial lodges or powers, they all have a common purpose: the realization of a high form of moral conduct and fraternal helpfulness. Masonry in its Christian garb, is a tame presentation of the splendors of the ceremonies of the ancient mysteries performed in the vast halls of rock-hewn temples, where every device the ingenuity of man could devise, contributed to awaken awe and overwhelm with fear in the trembling initiate.

It may be said, without fear of contradiction, that no ritual can be written, for any secret society, without drawing its vital forms from masonry. It occupies the entire field, and the countless societies which have started in rivalry, have been only weak imitations. The secrets and every word of the ritual of masonry have meanings, which date to periods remote at the advent of the Christian era.

Lorenzo W. Loomis (12 years of age): There is no necessity of scarlet fever leaving blindness and deafness and the many other organic wrecks behind it. These are far more the result of treatment and drugs than of the disease. They never follow the true hygienic treatment.

You are too young to determine what will be the best occupation for you in life. It would be harmful for you to be told. Do not think of that now, but study diligently and honestly in school, inform yourself on all subjects, that your understanding may be broad and comprehensive, and then when the opportunity comes you will be prepared to take advantage of it. Be assured that you will gain just such a position in the world as you thoroughly get prepared for. And if you are not prepared, should you accidentally find a place you will not be able to retain it.

E. B. Lynch: Q. Where can I procure the "Sixth and Seventh Books of Moses?"

A. Address the Truthseeker, New York City.

W. A. Darling: Q. Where can I obtain a copy of "Pike County Ballads," by John Hay?

A. As Secretary of State, John Hay appears to be ashamed of his early ballads, and would give the Philippines to have every copy of "Little Breeches" destroyed. Yet after he is utterly forgotten as a politician, he will be remembered as the author of these ballads. The book is out of print, but perhaps might be obtained through McClurg & Co., Chicago.

A. W. Main: Q. How shall I proceed to remember what occurs in my trance state?

A. The hypnotizer may control his subject to retain, or forget the occurrences or what is said or thought during the hypnotic state. Controlling spirits may do the same with their mediums. In the latter case they should be desired to produce the result desired.

In self-induced trance, the earnest desire at the passing into that condition should be sufficient to preserve the activity of self-consciousness, as dreams are remembered in the moments of waking.

LITTLE BREECHES.

* * * * * * * *

The snow came down like a blanket
As I passed by Taggart's store;
I went for a jug of molasses
And left the team at the door.
They scared at something and started—
I heard one little squall,
And hell-to-split over the prairie
Went team, Little Breeches and all.

Hell-to-split over the prairie!
I was almost froze with skeer;
But we routed up some torches,
And searched for 'em far and near.
At last we struck hosses and wagon,
Snowed under a soft white mound,
Upsot, dead beat—but of little Gabe
No hide nor hair was found.

And here all hope soured on me,
Of my fellow critter's aid—
I jest flopped down on my marrow-bones,
Crotch-deep in the snow, and prayed.
By this, the torches was played out
And me and Isrul Parr
Went off for some wood to a sheepfold
That he said was somewhar thar.

We found it at last, and a little shed
Where they shut up the lambs at night.
We looked in and seen them huddled thar.
So warm and sleepy and white;
And there sot Little Breeches and chirped,
As peart as ever you see,
"I want a chaw of terbacker,
And that's what's the matter of me."

How did he git thar? Angels.
He could never have walked in that storm;
They jest scooped down and toted him
To whar it was safe and warm.
And I think that saving a little child,
And fotching him to his own,
Is a derned sight better business
Than loafing around the throne.

A PEDDLER.

Was One Murdered at Hydesville?

To the Editor:—I read in your issue of May 10, from B. R. Anderson a statement referring to a former article from a correspondent, which I believe should not go unchallenged. He says: "In your issue of May 3, a correspondent again resurrects the body of a fictitious peddler. Well, there never was any truth in the story. The story has been refuted at least twice through the press by those who were present at the search."

I want our brother to name those parties, and the paper through which their refutation came. I have been a constant reader of Spiritualist literature for thirty-three years, and I have never seen any statement of the kind from those who pretended to be interested in the cause. Those raps were the first starting point to bring Spiritualism before the world. I have read the History of Modern American Spiritualism, by Mrs. Emma Hardinge. I knew the woman well, and will guarantee that there are a few left in this country that know her also. Mrs. Hardinge compiled that work, not from hearsay, but while nearly every person who had anything to do with it was alive, with a vivid memory of every event.

Does Mr. Anderson claim there was no name of Charles B. Rosna spelled out, claiming he was a murdered peddler? This question is very important, and I would like to have it answered. If the name was spelled out, then I want him to tell us who spelled it?

Mrs. Hardinge says, page 36, "Mr. David Fox succeeded in obtaining the full name of Charles B. Rosna." On page 34 is a statement made by Densler, one of the neighbors who was called in the first night, 31st of March. In this statement we find that he even went so far as to tell the sum of money they got from him. He says: "I went into the cellar with several others. I asked, if there had been a man buried in the cellar." The moment I asked the question there was a noise like the falling of a stick about a foot long and a half-inch through." On page 30 there is a statement from Lucretia S., who was stopping with the parties, who, the raps affirmed, murdered him. In this statement she says: "Such a peddler was there, and they sent her home, and the peddler agreed to bring her some goods, but she never saw him." These statement were made under oath, I believe. She also states that she stumped in the cellar bottom after her return, and got frightened, and they said they had been filling "rat holes." On page 37: "In the summer of 1848, when the ground was dry, and the water lowered, the diggings again commenced, when they found a plank, a vacant place or hole, some bits of crockery, which seemed to be parts of a wash-bowl, charcoal, quicklime, some human hair, bones (declared on examination by a surgeon to be human), and a portion of a human skull."

Now, did Mrs. Hardinge make this up, and add it to this book?

Had this peddler friends in this country, and they had taken this testimony as given here, it would have hung those people for murder; but those interested here had no wish or disposition to prosecute the parties at all. They were hunting for the evidence of a soul who had left the body; not for murderers.

Our enemy, the Christians, have tried to discount these investigations and statements and have charged that the investigators put those things there to fool the world, and now our pretended friends would throw discredit upon the whole history by charging the same fraud. These facts are too well known to be refuted by one man, with all the hearsay stories he may bring. Mrs. Hardinge was a noble, truthful, honest woman, and never put a word in that history that was not vouched for by the most reliable testimony. She is gone to her noble reward, and I am proud to-day to be one to defend her character, her honor, and her history.

PALEMON C. MILLS.

Portland, Oregon.

Having seen no report for a long time in The Progressive Thinker in regard to the condition and work of Spiritualism in this part of the great Pacific Northwest, I thought a few items might be of interest to the readers of your excellent paper.

The cause of Spiritualism is evidently advancing, and especially is it moving forward in this city, and has been doing so for the last two or three years, and so marked has been its progress that all unprejudiced observers can see it. The First Spiritualist Society is an old landmark here, and has kept the white banner of peace and progress unfurled to the breeze for many years. It is a member of the N. S. A., and rejoices in its good work. This society holds two meetings every Sunday. In addition to this, it fosters two other societies, namely, the Woman's Auxiliary and the Progressive Lyceum, also the Circle of Harmony.

The membership of the First Spiritualist Society has been steadily increasing for the last several years. A large and intelligent audience fills the hall every Sunday evening. Mr. J. H. Lucas is the lecturer, and is now serving his third term in this capacity. Mrs. C. Cornelius, a medium of marked ability, is the test medium for the society, and is serving her second term with great acceptability.

Recently a new society has been formed on the east side of the river. We learn they have large audiences and that great interest has been awakened. The chief promoters of the movement are G. C. Love, lecturer, and Mrs. Ladd-Fimican, test medium.

Besides the above-mentioned societies, there are three other meetings. One of these holds services every Monday evening, in the parlors of The World's Advance Thought. Also every Tuesday afternoon and every Friday afternoon spiritual meetings are held at the same place for the purpose of spiritual culture. These meetings are, to a considerable extent, carried on by spirit influences through the mediumship of Mrs. Lucy A. Mallory, editor of The World's Advance Thought.

As a typical illustration of spiritual living, and as an example of unselfish devotion to the cause of humanity, Mrs. Mallory is worthy of all praise. Her time is given to the work, and her means are bestowed upon it with a lavish hand, and it should be the earnest desire and persevering endeavor of all to help lift mankind up to a higher plane of thought, living and enjoyment.

But I must not forget to mention that two very interesting Spiritualist meetings are held each week at Captain and Mrs. McMillen's residence, where the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism are always presented so clearly that the interest continues unabated.

THE GREAT QUESTION.

Education, Democracy, Philosophy Etc.

In The Progressive Thinker, No. 651, J. S. Loveland has a communication on Spiritual education. It commences with a beautiful optimism and ends with a pessimism cold enough to congeal the air he breathes. He admits that his early education was in a barbaric college. This easily accounts for his present condition. He is in the unfortunate condition of the minister's son that was brought up so strict that when coming to his freedom he went to the other extreme. But, dear brother, don't be discouraged. Nature made you of good stuff, and you have glory ahead of you. You are now tired and exhausted from your long continued effort to cast off those iron fetters. A burnt child dreads the fire for a long time afterward. In your case the iron evidently was so hot that it smarts yet. You disclose that you were compelled to spend the best years of your life in trying to master the Bible in the Hebrew, Greek and Latin languages. That surely was enough to have soured a saint. You may thank your stars that you escaped as well as you did.

You still make the mistake of calling all of the higher institutions of learning anti-democratic. Your argument is that they are so because of being built by individual gifts. Then your article goes on to say that "only the common schools are democratic." Had you reversed the statement it would have been nearer the truth.

The individual free gifts for education are from pure love and understanding. When the individual parts with that money he no longer has control of it any more than the man has of real estate after giving a quit claim deed of it. The gift for education is from the most democratic motive; to bring men to a better knowledge is the object. It is a pleasure. The common schools are established by a compulsory tax that with all individuals is not paid with pleasure. I almost wonder, that the brother didn't go on and denounce Morris Pratt for giving his property. It is true that sometimes the giver, after having done such a great good, tries to get a little selfish benefit back. But a time comes when he must die, and then the grand democratic public has as free a hand with it as with what is built by the sometimes odious compulsory tax.

Democracy means freedom to choose. The colleges and universities have grown to be so democratic that they have a variety of courses from which the student may select. The public school offers no such freedom. A most noble democrat in principle has just given $10,000,000 to establish a post graduate college in Washington, D. C. There is not an American so base as to believe he has a sinister motive behind it.

The article further gives Moses Hull a slight nudge about prayer. It would also seem to prod Moses because he explains the Bible intelligently instead of lampooning it.

Bro. L. has studied the Spiritualists insufficiently if he thinks there is any class of them that would desire a return to the barbarous dead language college. He seems to fear this fire has burn apparently still smarts.

Martin Luther could not strive to change all of Catholicism. He only altered the wicked portion took the sting out. That was enough for one step, and was quite sufficient for the philosopher would cease to grow the tree from seed to full age in a day. The philosopher is a most valuable agitator, and a most dangerous statesman. The statesman is able to see a little good in the labors of the ancestors.

There is a degree of education that all must have alike. All must know the multiplication system. As time comes however when students must part company. The world has many departments of labor and each requires special preparation. As common as the work of farming is supposed to be, it requires preparedness. Why anyone should make Spiritualism an exception to this universal rule is difficult to fathom. The opposers might reply that they did not oppose preparedness, but only the kind. Such objection would be reasonable. The old lady said there was more than one way to hang a dog.

Bro. L. still goes on and says no one has authority to teach a special definition of Spiritualism. He is right. And no one claims such authority. Spiritualism is kaleidoscopic. The Morris Pratt Institute will thoroughly recognize this beautiful truth and will teach it. It will teach that the spirit world has as many views and theories as Europe has. The Spirit college will not exist to make Spiritualism. It will exist to save it.

The brother says none but aristocrats make endowments to educational institutions. Just the opposite of this is true. An aristocrat never makes such an endowment. Aristocracy and selfishness are synonymous terms. The last hundreds of thousands the people under the aristocratically governed Europe to this democratic United States, and receive their reply.

In the same number of The Progressive Thinker William E. Bonney has a communication asking "What shall we do with the graduates?" We shall do nothing with them. They will be so well equipped that they can take care of themselves. They will be what the growing, progressive public is hungering for and now can't get. For instance, the little 20,000 inhabitants capital city of Wisconsin is honeycombed with finely intelligent Spiritualists, and they have a meeting there, and all because the supply no longer equals the demand. This one town illustrates the whole country. There is a little Spiritualist meeting out here in the country composed entirely of farmers. Two of its members told me they intended to attend the college. They have no idea of ever making a dollar out of it. Their sole idea is to be able to grace the cause they love. They are tired of seeing it trampled in the mire. When law schools, medical colleges, electrical engineering institutes, etc., are established do they ever ask What shall we do with the graduates? One-quarter of the medical graduates never practice the profession, and they never regret the education. Brother Bonney goes on and answers his own question, and does it with a quite a natural gloominess. He would not be as he studies the situation most [illegible] so gloomy.

He says at present the speaker needs a first-class medium partner. He is right. And many of the speakers almost need two. The phenomena is the a-b-c of Spiritualism, but it is not the whole of it, more than it is the whole of literature. As long as there is any portion of humanity unconvinced the phenomena will be necessary. After this there is a whole universe of spirit world knowledge that is hungered for as eagerly as the sun drinks up the morning dew. But it is wanted in a digestible condition.

In his closing paragraph Brother B. brightens up and strikes a beautifully musical chord. He says "there is room for legions of workers." Then he asks "how can the teacher and the masses be brought together?" This is a question that the work of the college will answer. I have met many mediums and speakers and nearly all have lamented their unfitness.

A graduate of the Spiritualist college will be just as free to pray, or not to pray, as he was before matriculating. He will be just as free to present any phase, or explanation, of Spiritualism as now. Whatever he does he will be able to do it interestingly. He will still be entirely free to teach an "Infinite Intelligence," or any other kind of Intelligence.

Science could stumble along for a time in homespun array, but to continue a permanent force and reach the top round, and stay there, great culture was required until now it carries a greater finish of education than any other department of knowledge.

Verona, Wis. E. W. BALDWIN.

THE EDUCATION PROBLEM.

The Other Side of the Matter.

How many times I have thought of expressing a few thoughts on the same line as given by Clara Watson, of Jamestown, N. Y. Yes, what is the matter with us, anyhow? Is Spiritualism trying to be popular, to get into the swim, where the tide will float us along with ease without an effort to ward off counter currents, and become fossilized; to a system of prescribed rules as set forth by some wise faculty; to obtain permits, or diplomas, before going forth as teachers or aids to the imparting of knowledge or giving consolation from departed friends to the people of this plane of being, through any and all of the various avenues or mediums of expression in which Nature has so wisely adapted the means to the end? No sane person will discourage schools, or the means of education. Yes, indeed, what intent can Brother Hull have in, that strong affirmation, that no respectable young man or woman would be willing to go before the world (that is stand on the same rostrum) with the ignorant or uneducated; or without a diploma—is not that the inference?

From time to time such kind of talk has been expressed through the columns of The Progressive Thinker, and by the fairness of its worthy editor, that all views may be represented, and it has cast a gloom and put a cold damper on many an uneducated sensitive to give expression to their undesired and unsought natural gifts.

When I first came to Michigan the woods were covered with the most exquisite and beautiful flowers, of all shades and colors, without culture by the hand of man, but just as they came from the bosom of nature; and has there been any imperfect, undeveloped flowers or frauds? There might have been for those who seek for frauds, of which so much has been said. Now through the law of expectancy, persons can meet with what they expect to find. If we go to a seance or medium with the expectation of finding fraud, we shall surely find what we seek for, to gratify our expectations, every time.

Let us leave fraud at home, and go with clean, pure desires for truth, and the rubbish will soon burn itself out. It has been my desire for many years past to seek for tangible facts through all avenues obtainable to know of a life beyond the present one, and it has come through children as well as middle and old age. Yes, Spiritualism has chosen the unlettered and the unlearned. Were Blind Tom and Mollie Fancher college students.

Mrs. Watson has cited many of our most earnest and logical and inspirational workers, and now in this connection I wish to refer to one whom I have known for many years, in the personability of Dr. P. T. Johnson, of Battle Creek, Mich. He tells me he graduated or was developed on a pine stump, in the north of Michigan. He could not write his name, or add up a column of figures, when the unseen forces took him, and now how does he stand as a talker, and he has all he can do in the practice of medicine, and how did he get it?

In a conversation with a citizen of Battle Creek not long since, he told me that one of the most convincing proofs that ever came, under his observation, of an unseen invisible intelligence, call it spirits or anything you please, is in the case of Dr. Johnson, knowing what he was and what he now is. When the fires of inspiration are kindled and given expression through his organism, they reach 16½ to the pound.

Let us encourage getting wisdom; but let us get understanding, and then much learning cannot make mad, most noble Festus. LEVI WOOD.

B. O. Flower's Review.

A late number of the Arena has a review of Dr. Bland's book, "In the World Celestial," which fills nine pages of that magazine, and which contains a tribute to Spiritualism, as a science, a philosophy and a religion, of the highest character. In its opening, the editor says: "Three things make the work remarkable; its authorship, the astounding claims put forth by the author, and the philosophy and revelation of a future life it embodies. The author, Dr. Bland, is widely known as one of the most honest, sincere, fearless and thoughtful men of our times. And more than this, for the last forty years he has bravely championed almost every just cause that has come before the public. His pen has wrought great good in the cause of human emancipation and progress. His vigorous mentality has always been the servant of an enlightened conscience, and there has never been a time when he has not unhesitatingly spurned wealth, fortune and popular applause when right, or the best interests of the people lay in the opposite direction. Such is the man who has written this work. The chief interest in the book is found in the ethical philosophy it embodies and in the definite revelation it unfolds concerning the heavenly state that awaits the soul."

The reviewer classes this book with the works of Professors Joseph Rodes Buchanan, Stainton Moses, Henry Kiddle, William Denton, Alfred Russel Wallace, and Elizabeth Barret Browning, William and Mary Howitt and Gerald Massey, and says "The teachings of the work are thoroughly representative of the convictions of a large number of highly intelligent and thoughtful people, and the ethics advanced are inspiring and uplifting." He quotes from Rev. George C. Lorimer's recent book, which denounces Spiritualism as a religion, without a message, and says, "Dr. Bland's book holds a complete answer to Dr. Lorimer."

The whole nine page review is replete with interest, but want of space forbids further quotations from it.

Dr. Bland's book is for sale by The Progressive Thinker. Price $1.

"Just How to Wake the Solar Plexus." By Elizabeth Towne. Valuable for health. Price 25 cents.

"The Majesty of Calmness, or Individual Problems and Possibilities." By Wm. George Jordan. Another valuable little work. Price 30 cents. For sale at this office.

BEYOND THE VAIL
A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,
By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

"THE UNKNOWN"
—BY—
CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. Price $2.00.

REFLECTIONS.

The Lesson of the Great Earthquake.

It is manifold. Prominent among the features of this manifold lesson is the perpetual persistence of Nature's message to every thinking being. This is a message revealed not in books nor in any book whatsoever. Neither is it mainly expressed in the demonstrative type of the earthquake's shock, the lightning's stroke or the hurricane's breath. It is rather that eternal whispering of myriad-voiced silence which seems to say to all "Be still and listen to my message. Learn once for all that truth which is at once the center and the measure of Infinite Energy, is also the foundation of harmony." This energy is eternally expressing itself throughout the universe of nature. This harmony is the ultimate aim in all her actions. This activity is perpetual in every atom of our body; is simply one eternal round of change, both within us and around us. Right here is one of the strongest hints of the law of eternal progression.

But how is it that nature, herself eternally active, changing, moving, can consistently say to us, "Be still and learn of me?" How can man find it wise thus to depart from the example, while obeying the precept of nature? Ah, herein is revealed a sublime paradox! Here we see the littleness and the greatness of man. He is at once infinitely inferior and infinitely superior to his time-honored preceptor. The ultimate aim of nature in the process of evolution is forever the same. It is to perfect conditions so as to make possible the production of the best specimens of the various life forms. When this has been achieved, she then trusts to the wisdom of the plan and the instincts of the individuals to successfully carry out the obvious meaning of this fact achieved, to-wit, the rational and complete enjoyment of life thus made possible. This general fact is so plain that he who runs may read.

In this evolutionary process, increasing intelligence always manifests increasing ascendancy over the elements, till man is reached. Throughout the scale is manifest the absolute powerlessness of the creature, at the approach of the great characteristic change that comes to all. This is where Nature with infinite ease asserts her supremacy.

This brings us face to face with the consideration of Life and Death in the ordinary accepted meaning of the terms. One of the first things we see in this review of earth as an immense charnel house, is that in the various species of animal life, so many of them prey upon another. It is a rule with probably no exceptions that no given species is ever at war with itself. That is to say, Nature, while yielding one species as the rightful prey of another, has successfully guarded the fate of all members of a given species from death voluntarily inflicted by other members of the same species. This fact we say is true as we go on in the ascending scale of life till—when? Till man is reached. How profoundly significant the fact that cannibalism is not found among the lower orders of animal life on earth! Why may we not go a step further and truthfully declare that cannibalism has never prevailed to any extent among human species? Does the fault lie with Nature? Has she shown each to preserve the life of its own kind, and stopped short when the highest of all has been reached?

The pertinence of this question is none the less manifest because the practice of cannibalism is restricted at the present day to very limited areas of the world. The horror of cannibalism in its essence consists not in the mere fact that a portion of the flesh of one individual has been used by another as food. This could never have taken place except the previous fact of death (by violence) had made the eating possible. The essence of the horror in the case is the voluntary infliction of violent death of one individual by another member of the same species. What we desire to make plain right here is the sameness of murder in all cases. How little difference is it that the (recognized) cannibal when he has destroyed the life of a body, afterward appropriates a portion of it as food. The civilized (?) man sanctions the essential fact of cannibalism, (to-wit, murder), as being thoroughly honorable and indeed necessary to the well-being of society under certain circumstances.

What is the conclusion in this matter? Has nature been uniformly successful in committing the life of the species to the keeping of its individual members in all other grades of animal life and failed only in the case of man? and if so, where shall we look for the solution of the mystery? A greater question still is, where is the effectual remedy? The great earthquake on the Island of Martinique is to my mind a strong hint that the first question is answered emphatically in the negative. With the dawn of reason in the animal kingdom begins the receding of the supremacy of instinct. When man is reached the dominance of reason on the one hand and of instinct on the other is divided. Nature in now committing the life of the species to the keeping of the individual, still commits it particularly to the instinct which in the lower orders was always unerring, but which in man has ceased to be adequate.

Reason, which in the divine economy was intended to come to the rescue at this stage, so that their combined action (reason and instinct), might be effectual, has also failed. Man still clamors for the life-blood of his fellowman, and does not hesitate under certain conditions to use violence in order to consummate his fell purpose.

For ages Nature has been silently whispering her protest, and thus inviting man to use his reason to better effect, to pause and reflect maturely upon all the divine problems which she perpetually propounds for his consideration. Not one of them can he afford to pass lightly by. Of all these problems, none is of more pressing importance at the present time than the oldest of all problems, the question of Life and Death among our own species, and of our own conduct bearing upon the same.

The two principal seats of war are in Southern Africa and Venezuela. The position of Martinique adjacent to both, is as if Nature, weary of her long struggle in the effort to win our reason by her silence, had determined to rebuke our tardiness in learning the value of human life, had planted her batteries on the ocean as a formal declaration of war, and in this awful example would say to us, "behold the horror of your own conduct! See in this act of mine a reflection of your own work of death and carnage. Presume no longer to exercise the prerogative which Nature claims as exclusively her own! Know once for all that one single human life taken voluntarily and by violence, whatever may have been the provocation, transcends the power of man to estimate for horror and atrocity. Let war and capital punishment be abolished instantly and forever! Let not one human life more be sacrificed upon the altar of man's thoughtlessness or perverted instinct.'

DEDICATION.

Warner Spiritual Temple, Springfield, Mo.

The dedication of the Warner Spiritual Temple, at Springfield, Mo., occurred Sunday, May 18, 1902.

This temple was built by Mrs. Lizzie Warner, of 1132 Robberson avenue, at the request of her spirit husband, Mr. Herman Warner. Three years ago, at G. A. R. Hall, on Commercial street, the Rev. Josie K Folsom prophesied there would be a Spiritual church in this city, but it did not materialize at just the time prophesied, but it now stands with open doors for all who will to come in and receive demonstrated truth of spirit return and to receive messages of love from dear ones gone before, and its rostrum is freely offered to ministers of any denomination to freely speak the dictations of his or her heart.

The rostrum was beautifully decorated with potted plants and cut flowers whose fragrance filled the little temple, and a refreshing breeze stirred the leaves of the palms. Upon the rostrum, resting upon an easel, was a portrait of Mr. Herman Warner, and in in one corner of the frame was a cabinet picture of Mrs. Lizzie Warner, and on the side wall, over the piano, was a portrait of Mr. Andrew Jackson Davis, the great seer. The weather was beautiful and everything was favorable for the grand occasion, and every one present was joyous and happy and enjoyed the exercises greatly. There was a goodly number of the South Side Spiritualists present, and a number of strangers and many young people. The children were many with merry faces and joyous shouts, before and after services, and they took a very active part in the work

The opening address by C. W. Stewart and the remarks by Revs. J. Madison and M. Theresa Allen, were eloquently delivered, and the magnificent arrangement and manner in which our little pastor handled the exercises brought many earnest congratulations.

Following the programme to the dedication address by Rev. Josie K. Folsom, and to the benediction by the same, just a moment before the pronouncing of the benediction, Miss Jessie Bell took her seat at the piano and while she played a march, the door opened from rooms adjoining the temple and the lyceum choir, consisting of some twenty or more children, marched in and twice around the temple, and then after strewing the rostrum with flowers, sang a sweet song, with words arranged by Josie K. Folsom, in a most beautiful and touching manner, and many were the tears that flowed at the beautiful sight. This was one of the grandest of the exercises, and our little pastor and her co-workers deserve great credit for their work and arrangement of this feature. The little temple was filled to the uttermost and many had to stand. There were also present several ministers of the different denominations of the city, in response to the cordial invitations sent out by Rev. Josie K. Folsom.

The afternoon service was opened by Mrs. Folsom, who with a few pleasant words welcomed all present. There was then a song by the choir, followed by the programme.

The evening meeting opened at 8:15 with a crowded house, and it was 10:30 before the close. The opening song was followed by the invocation by J. Madison Allen. Instrumental music by Miss Darr, Miss Belt and the Egbert sisters was beautifully rendered and a song by Mr. Isaac Gilburger was excellent.

After the afternoon services supper was served in the rooms adjoining the temple and all were cordially invited to remain and enjoy the feast.

Mrs. Lizzie Warner modestly declined to receive public thanks for the great interest she has taken in the cause of Modern Spiritualism or for the building of the temple. She simply says, "I am doing the work for my spirit husband, who requested me to do the work he left unfinished in this life."

We have two societies here, the one on the South Side presided over by J. Madison Allen and M. Theresa Allen, who are earnest and faithful workers; the Warner Spiritual Temple on the North Side, presided over by Clarence M. and Josie K. Folsom; and with such earnest, untiring instruments as the Allens and Folsoms in the field, we feel sure that Modern Spiritualism will never die.

The Folsom Lyceum will in the near future be one of the grandest features in connection with the Warner Spiritual Temple, and will meet every Sunday morning in the Temple at 9:30. There are now about 26 children enrolled and we hope soon to have 100. There will also be Bible lessons at 2:30 p. m. each Sunday in the Temple, and at 7:30 p. m., Mrs. Folsom will give spirit messages. UNCLE PRATT.

Impending Calamity.

To the Editor:—Knowing that you are interested in anything that pertains to the occult; a strange occurrence happened here in St. Louis, in a friend's house, on April 22, when Mrs. Maud Lord Drake, in a small seance amongst friends, was controlled by a scientist, who informed us that there was an impending calamity hovering near which would startle the world by its awful death mortality.

This same lady in an office in St. Louis, foretold the Galveston disaster five months before it happened, also the Johnstown flood.

I have just now received a letter from her, dated May 21, from Denver, Colo., where she is staying, in which she says that this same scientist again came to her a day or so ago, and warned her that if the people do not move from those islands affected by volcanoes, that they will go under the water and finally sink. He particularly asked that people may be warned, so that they may know what is likely to occur.

He appeared to be greatly distressed and kept saying "So many, so many more and more disasters." He also stated that it will sometime again reach the old fields of South Carolina and Charleston, and they will receive a great earthquake shock, and it will probably do more damage than has been done before in centuries. He says the old earth appears to be turning upside down, and in his own words, "And oh, the deluge that will come."

Her last words in her letter are "Look out for cyclones." Things seem dreadfully uncertain. Spirits are running hither and thither."

I have taken the liberty of sending you this, knowing as I do that these signs are given to us, and that we should give good heed when warnings are sent to us by our spirit friends.

HEALTH RESTORED

The entire country is astonished at the wonderful cures perfected through the method originated by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Mich. This science is a subtle force in nature combined with magnetic medicines, and called by the eminent doctor,

Psychic Science

It has been termed the greatest pain reliever ever known. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system and restores health. It makes no difference how serious or hopeless the case may seem, there is positive hope in this grand science. It has restored the deaf, blind and lame, cured the paralytic, and those suffering from Bright's Disease, Consumption, Stomach Trouble, Catarrh, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Female Troubles, as well as men and women addicted to the liquor, morphine and other vile habits.

Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two month's treatment writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course. "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

"A Message of Hope"

written by Dr. J. M. Peebles, in a plain and concise manner, tells you exactly how and where you can gain perfect health; in fact, it gives you the key to the greatest knowledge known to man. Remember, this book costs you nothing, and it reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday realities of to-day.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and address and leading symptoms to Dr. J. M. Peebles and his associates and you will receive full diagnosis without any cost whatever, as well as this grand book, which is beautifully illustrated, rich in all its details, containing matter which will be a revelation to you. It is a token which any one may be proud of. Write to-day and receive "A Message of Hope" and diagnosis of your case absolutely free. Address

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to higher life, at the home of his son, B. G. Patterson, in Alexandria, Ind., May 18, Robert H. Patterson, aged 71 years and 18 days. He was for many years a believer in Spiritualism, having been converted from the Quaker religion. Funeral services conducted by HARRY J. MOORE.

On May 11, 1902, funeral services of Mrs. Myrtle Cook, wife of J. C. Cook, a young attorney of Fremont, Neb., were conducted by me in Arlington. Two beautiful little girls are left to the kind care of their grandparents.

A. SCOTT BLEDSOE.

William Hunt, nearly 83 years of age, a Spiritualist since 1848, and a reader of The Progressive Thinker as long as his failing eyes permitted, passed to spirit life, from Redlands, Cal., May 20, 1902. He was a high-souled, generous-hearted, truth-loving man. His funeral, at which the writer officiated, was probably the first Spiritualist funeral ever held in Redlands.

ELLA WILSON MARCHANT.
San Bernardino, Cal.

The many friends of Clarence and May Rockhill will be saddened to learn of the transition of their infant son, on May 11, 1902. Words of consolation were offered by O. P. Kellogg.

MRS. O. P. K.

Father Tom and the Pope,
Or a Night at the Vatican.
Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "puttеen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of water you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never known what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachrymachrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Nectar itself it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his episcopical mouth wid the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. WISDOM OF THE AGES.
Revelations from Zertoulem, the Prophet of Tlaskanata.
A Mine of Valuable Reflections and Suggestions.
This work was automatically transcribed by George A. Fuller, M. D., a gentleman who stands high as a lecturer and medium. It is a mine of valuable reflections and suggestions. The paragraphs are short, suggestive and inspiring. Every one of them leads to something higher, grander, nobler. Price $1.00.

Esoteric Lessons.
An Argument Against Physical Causation.
The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

HEALING, Causes and Effects, By W. P. Phelon, M. D. Deals with the finer mental and spiritual forces as applied to healing. Price, 50 cents.

A NEW CATECHISM,
BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.
This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book of reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c.

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND Other Offerings.
BY
EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.
This volume contains a selection of the best poems of this gifted author and stories contributed by Clair Tuttle in her charming style. There are 285 pages, with six full-page illustrations, including photogravures of the author and Clair Tuttle. It is bound in blue with aluminum embossing. Many of the poems are especially adapted for recitations.
The Author needs no introduction to the spiritual public. Her songs are among the best in spiritual literature. Epes Sargent said of one of her poems that it was the equal of anything in the language, and that she was the poet of the New Dispensation.
The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."
That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."
Will Carlton: "I have read with great interest."
Sarah Thorpe Thomas, the Humanitarian says: "A most exquisite bouquet * * * * the thoughts echo and re-echo through the deepest recesses of my heart. I have some word of praise for every page."
The author says in the dedication: "To those whose thoughts and longings reach into the unseen Land of Souls, this handful of asphodels, mixed with common flowers, is offered, hoping to give rest and pleasure while waiting at the way stations on the journey thither."

"GIVE US A NEW BIBLE IN HARMONY WITH SCIENCE."

Some Instructive Criticisms for the Especial Benefit of the Critics of the Bible.

Brother Wm. F. Hunt, of Santa Barbara, Cal., wants a new Bible, in harmony with science. He thinks the Bible we have now is only a human production, "written in an ignorant age;" in preference, he wants another human production, which would be written in a very conceited age. He does not think the old Bible is infallible, and he would probably have no better opinion of the New, unless he should write it himself. He staggers at the announcement that the heavens and the earth were made in six days; that the sun was intended to give light to the earth; that it rained forty days and forty nights, till all life was destroyed, save seed of each species, rescued by Noah in a big ship; that there never was a rainbow till Noah saw one; that the sun stood still for Joshua to make a complete finish of his enemies; that Jonah, preacher though he was, was tough enough to defy the gastric juice of a whale for three days, nights, etc., etc.

We respectfully suggest to Brother Hunt that, through some misguidance, he has missed the kernel and got choked on the hull.

What does Brother Hunt want with a Bible anyhow, new or old? If the one we have makes the path of duty plain, and gives the strongest possible incentives to walk in that path, what more can be reasonably asked? With light for his head and motive for his heart, what does Brother Hunt need but the energy of his will to enable him to grow to the stature of a perfect man, mentally and morally? Will he show us that the Bible which we now have is deficient in either of these respects? Let him do it, and we will own that he is talking to some purpose.

Suppose half the Bible should turn out to be myth, or legend or allegory, and that some of its historical passages should not be any more correct than history generally, which Sir Robert Walpole said "of course is false," would this materially hurt the book?

Does not the whole influence of the book for man's character-building—that is, for man's temporal and eternal salvation; for salvation is in character, and in nothing else—lie in its lessons, and in the motives by which those lessons are enforced? Until the lessons or the motives can be assailed, will not the book remain essentially intact?

The bibles of all ages and nations were given to teach religion and morals, not science. What, then, if our Bible should not be scientifically exact? Would that be of any importance? Would any college refuse to hire a professor of Greek because he is not up in Choctaw?

When Abraham arrived in Canaan, it is said in the English Bible that he "entered and passed through to the plain of Moreh;" the Latin Vulgate, authority for the Catholic church, says, "to the oak of Moreh;" the Greek Septuagint, authority for Jesus and the New Testament writers, says, "to the terebinth tree of Moreh." Who cares whether it was a plain, an oak, or a terebinth tree? Let Brother Hunt choose which version he pleases; will his salvation be affected? He knows it will not.

Our English version, following the Hebrew, says: "This is that Ana, the son of Zibeon, who found his father's asses in the wilderness." Instead of "asses," the Vulgate reads, "hot springs." What matters it? Will the Holy Ghost bother himself to set us right between asses and hot springs? We think that only asses would expect it.

The preachers say that the Bible is given by inspiration of God; but would it not be sufficient if inspiration should attend to the lessons and the motives, and decline to concern itself about such unimportant details as asses, hot springs, plains, oaks, and terebinth trees? The man who says otherwise would reject from the human family a male who could not start hair on his upper lip.

The three great versions of the Scriptures, Septuagint, Vulgate, and English, just mentioned, differ in scores of places, sometimes by whole chapters. The Septuagint omits a long chapter from the history of David and Saul; the verses of some of the later chapters of Exodus in the Septuagint, as compared with the English Bible, look as if they had been struck by a cyclone, blown about in all directions, and some of them lost irrecoverably. What of it? Circulated, read and regarded, will there be any difference at all in the influence of these versions upon the people? not an atom.

Men are taught by history, by legend, by fact, by fiction, by precept, by allegory. If the Bible be God's book, will he disdain six vehicles out of seven and confine himself to literal statement only? Certain Christians, determined to have it thus, reach strange conclusions, putting stumbling-blocks in the way of Brother Hunt and others, who, instead of studying the Bible itself, as they should, attend mostly to what these simpletons are saying. The literalists make themselves ridiculous and their Bible ridiculous.

A horse bit his master,
How came it to pass?
He heard the good pastor
Say, "All flesh is grass;"

and the good pastor took the words without change from Isaiah. The Romish church, following the horse's literalism, has turned the wafer, over which the priest has prayed, into "a whole Christ, body, blood, and bones." And so every Catholic is a cannibal—a monstrous one at that, for he swallows the good Lord that died for him, at a single gulp. Is the Bible responsible for such nonsense? Men are, but the Bible is not.

If Brother Hunt and his friends would study the Bible more and science more, they would write less of the Bible—at least, in a captious way.

We say, if they would study the Bible more, Brother Hunt would find from the narrative itself that the six days of creation are six periods of possibly millions of years each; for how otherwise could it be said a little further on, "These are the generations of the heavens and the earth in the days"—the singular is used, mark you—"in the day that God created them"—obviously a long period embracing the six shorter ones, and still called a "day."

We say, if they would study science more. A frog was removed the other day, which had defied the gastric juice of a woman's stomach for five years, and was a lively frog every minute of that time. Live Jonahs and live frogs are not reduced by gastric juice.

Let us be certain about our Bible and certain about our science before we make haste to parade them in opposition, at the risk of making asses of ourselves.

What the Bible teaches, and what Christians teach about the Bible are often two very different things. If Brother Hunt will keep this better in mind, we think he will stumble less.

What is the Bible anyhow? As Protestants hold it, it is a collection of sixty-six books, written mostly or wholly by Hebrew pens—leaflets dropped along the flight of ages for 1,500 years. They are the work of a people who devoted themselves to the study of religion and morals, as no other ancient people ever did. Along this line they outdid all their contemporaries, simply because they turned their attention to it. The man who makes a thing his specialty will some day be inspired, or seem to others so to be.

When we want to know about electricity, we go to the men who have studied it; nor do we despise Franklin and Faraday because they knew less than Edison and Tesla. When we want to learn the best concerning religion and morals, we must look to the men or the peoples who have made these their specialty. If there had not been a Franklin, there could not be an Edison; if there had not been a Moses, there could not have been a Jesus Christ. The mistakes or ignorance of Moses if proved by an Ingersoll, or anybody else, need not grieve us more than the mistakes or ignorance of a Faraday or a Franklin.

The ancient Chaldeans were polytheists, and the ancient Egyptians had so many gods that even Greeks and Romans laughed at them. The Hebrews came out of Chaldea, or out of Egypt, or, according to the Bible, out of both. How, from such origin and surroundings, they could have gone forth bearing aloft the banner of a stern, uncompromising monotheism, is a nine days' wonder, and those who scoff at Moses and the Bible will have the chief difficulty in explaining it. That Moses with such national antecedents and surroundings, should have taught as he did, is nothing short of amazing. Convince him of mistakes if you can; no other man, save Jesus Christ, ever left such an impress on the ages.

This was the noblest warrior
That ever buckled sword;
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word;
And never earths' philosopher
Traced with his golden pen
On the deathless page truth half so sage
As he wrote it down for men.

All nations have their myths; but the myths of the Hebrews were vastly diverse from those of the Greeks, Egyptians, or others. The myths of the Greeks were weird poetic fancies, usually meaningless, or nearly so, and seldom or never with any moral significance; but the myths of the Hebrews invariably make for righteousness. The Garden of Eden, the Flood, Abraham and Lot, Sodom, Samson, Elijah, Jonah, Daniel, all were lessons unto uprightness; and, true or not true historically, ought to live on when William Tell and the apple, and George Washington and the hatchet are forgotten. And they will live on. Compared with their contemporaries, the Hebrews were certainly a "peculiar people"—a seed in whom, as time has demonstrated, all the world should be blessed.

The books of the Bible illustrate the progress in theology and ethics of this wonderful people. Was some of their work imperfect, especially their earlier work? When was early work in any line otherwise than imperfect? The books of the Bible imply a confession of this fact. If the Old Testament had been a perfect revelation, where would have been the need of the New? And if the New were the last word of God to men, why should Jesus, the evening before his crucifixion, have said: "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now; howbeit, when he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth."

The Bible, be it observed, is not a book at all, but rather a library; a collection of sixty-six books bound for convenience under one cover. It does not claim infallibility for itself as a whole, nor for any single book, unless we must except the Book of Revelation. The unknown author of the Epistle to the Hebrews finds fault with the Mosaic arrangements, all of them being temporary, and only a "schoolmaster to bring us to Christ;" and Jesus himself teaches that the facility given by Moses to divorce was only an accommodation to circumstances, and not an expression of the ideal.

Each of these books of the Bible stands by itself or falls by itself. If we find a flaw in one of the books, this cannot affect the rest. To be sure, the preacher has too often been heard to say that a single error, discovered and proven, must destroy our confidence in the whole volume. Nothing more foolish was ever uttered. Probably none but an ignoramus ever said it. We might as well bind Milton, Shakspeare, David, Harum, the Children of the Abbey, and the James Boys in one volume, and then proceed to throw all away because we have found something in one of the books that will not bear criticism.

We suggest to Brother Hunt that what of the Bible he cannot accept as history, he may perhaps accept as legend or allegory; yet he will find the lessons precisely the same. Brother Hunt knows this; and he knows, too, that it is the lessons alone that concern him. Origen, of the second century, the most learned of the Christian fathers, regarded the story of Eden as an allegory; and thousands of good Christians have so regarded it since. Brother Hunt is, therefore, under no necessity to go nosing up and down the earth with some devout people in quest of traces of a lost garden that never really existed. Any man with a clear head must know at once from the narrative itself that it cannot be literal. A garden, watered by the Euphrates and the Tigris, and by two other rivers, one of them possibly in the Vale of Cashmere, and the other in the valley of the Nile, assigned to be kept by a naked man and women, without so much as a hatchet or a hoe, and whose experience had not yet taught them the difference between a stalk of maize and a Scotch thistle, is simply unthinkable. Talk about Paradise for such a pair, and confronting a job like that! But the story means that while man follows duty rather than appetite, he dwells in a garden of delight; that man and woman are one, she being taken from his side, "that he may have her ever at his side, an individual solace dear;" that they have no reason to be ashamed of anything but sin; that temptation glides in like a slimy, hypnotizing snake; that the strongest temptation of the woman is ambition; that the strongest temptation of the man is the woman; that sin flies to vain excuses—makes for itself fig-leaf coverings which do not conceal; that it reduces the sinner to the likeness of a beast, and this by divine law, for the Lord God clothed them with the skins of animals; that the sinner goes out from his garden of delight into a condition represented by a wilderness of briers and thorns; that instead of finding more happiness by self-indulgence, he finds far less; that going wrong is easy, but getting back to the right again is like getting past cherubim with flaming swords turning every way to keep the way of the Tree of Life. Now when you have read the story thus, go further and call it a Chaldean legend, if you choose, which it probably is; and then say whether Moses is to blame for recording it; or whether so much important truth was ever before or since taught in so brief a space and in a manner so pleasing and effective. Does not Brother Hunt see that, whether the story be literal or figurative, fact or fable, the lessons are absolutely the same? and does not his common sense tell him that this is the "milk in the cocoanut," and that only a fool will break his teeth on the hull? We defy him to find in the whole circle of heathen fable a myth half so fraught with wholesome instruction for mankind.

And yet the Don Quixotes who ride forth to rid the world of Bible giants are pretty sure to have their first tilt in the Garden of Eden.

But of course, Jonah must take his turn. We have heard of him and the speaking ass that Balaam rode, ad nauseam. And yet a man, determined on his own way in opposition to God's will, has less brains than the ass on which he rides; and if Brother Hunt will take this lesson, he is quite at liberty to regard the story as inauthentic, leaving greater faith to simpler minds. Brother Hunt will lose nothing by throwing away the hull, so long as he keeps the kernel.

The author of the Book of Jonah probably never dreamed that his story would sometime be mistaken for history. He wanted to show that God's dominion is wider than the borders of a single people; that a man cannot run away from God; that guilty minds connect storms with their sins; that the guilty are likely to sleep soundest when the danger is nearest; that God directs events among heathen as among Hebrews; that the guilty cannot escape; that sinners may refuse to repent on dry land, but they will not refuse to repent in a whale's belly; that deathbed repentance does not change character, since, though Jonah "cried to the Lord out of the whale's belly," when his feet struck dry land, he was still the same Jonah; that such a one does good because he must, and not because he will; that God cares for heathen as for Hebrews, turning away his wrath even from Ninevites when they repent; that the man who will repent only in a whale's belly would see a whole cityful of his enemies, with 120,000 babies too young to discern their right hand from their left, go down to destruction, and see it gladly, at the very moment that he is whining for himself because he has lost the shadow of his gourd which protected him from the sun; and that he will close his history, quarreling with a God who cannot please him, because, forsooth, he is a God who cares for others as well as for him, and who lets genuine repentance count for something. If Brother Hunt will now read anew the story of Jonah, with an eye to Jonah's Mistakes and their Consequences, he may get the kernel without being choked on the hull.

We do not think it necessary to help Brother Hunt any further. He is evidently a bright man, and much more reasonable than some; it is for this very cause that we have volunteered a little of our time in his behalf. If we had to read our Bible as some Christians read it; we own that we would have no Bible; we would be as obstreperous as Brother Hunt; but we don't have to read it in any such foolish way. We think the Bible as it is will answer very well for a few more years at least; but if Brother Hunt is still urgent for a new one, we now move that he be appointed a committee of one to "get it up," as, according to some, all bibles have been "gotten up;" and we hereby ask to be entered as a subscriber for the book as soon as it shall appear. We are mighty anxious to compare it with the old one. We think that if anything will cure the folly of these fellows who are incessantly clamoring for a new Bible and a new God, it will be a serious effort to put better in their places. We have watched anxiously for something constructive along these lines, but thus far have seen nothing at all.

Really, would it not be better to let the Christians and their Bible alone, and attend to our raising of spirits? "Ne sutor ultra crepidam," says the old adage; "Let not the shoemaker go beyond his last."

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

He Writes of Martinique and Nature's Forces

The Progressive Thinker, No. 652, must be an eye-opener to the old straigth-jacketed, who believed that God talked to Noah about his bow in the cloud as a symbol of his covenant with him that he would not drown the earth any more. Then, in less than 2,000 years of which he have any record, nearly 1,000,000 human beings are swept out of life by seismatic disturbances of one kind and another. What does this prove? That God violated his promise? Not at all; but that he never made any such promise. The whole story of "God said," in this connection was the ideal poesy of some psychic person, who wanted a reason for the rainbow, beyond the refracting power of drops of water.

The more we compare these sweet idylls of the dwellers in sunny lands with the actual and constant occurrences in nature, the more we must be convinced that it is in no sense a personal God we worship, but the working out of a law brought into being by the emanation of thought from spirit, and set in motion by the intense desire of that Spirit for expression and accomplishment.

This law acts on the inert and impermanent. Under the law, a flood seeks either a lower level or dispersion, and generally both. Concentrated force of heat, steam and gases must have enlargement. The heat of the sun and the interior of the earth are allied. These all follow out the law.

A chemist places a mass of chemicals in a vessel, they act and react. After the action is set up, no power on earth can stop it. It must go on under the law of its existence, until they have all worked out the result. No human hand can stay them, so long as they are in touch.

In like manner, all the environments of man and man himself move in the "dance of death," for such life has always been considered by the sages and seers of the past. As the germ force of all seeds, starting with the minute vesicle, will go on to blossom and fruitage, so the point of manifestation in the law stirs all nature to the final fulfilling and completion. It is irresistible in its movement. Does man effect a change in the law? Not the slightest. Often in his intense desire, he reacts upon himself, and aligns both the higher and the lower consciousness with the law. Then all things seem to come his way. We cannot break the law, but we can break ourselves against it.

The residents at Martinique knew they might at any time be engulfed; but from the warm and fertile soil found in no other situation, a chance was offered for the accumulation of gold. Was God or God's laws to blame? They hurled their puny selves against the law, and we blame God. Are we just?

I also notice in the N. S. A. report an account of the beggarly pennies subscribed to the Mediums' Home fund, which should have been dollars instead. There is no wonder that Spiritualism languishes, when so noble a charity receives aid in so niggardly a manner, when the Spiritualists of this country can raise the amount inside of thirty days, if they choose, and no one feel the least strained. It is the teaching of the Wise Ones, that the selfish holding of hoards, congests the power of attracting means to ourselves, thus positively injuring our own prospects. To best continue the inpour into our treasuries, is by a judicious expenditure of funds put into our hands from time to time. This leaves a space for more. Spiritualists will be obliged to learn this lesson before they have potency enough to place themselves above persecution and other obstructions. How long before we learn this lesson.

Not far from where these lines are penned, buildings consisting of church, school and monastic college occupy a whole block. Substantially built, double phallic spires point into the blue. They are under the control of the disciples of St. Ignatius de Loyola, and by the way the Romish church is firmly "in the saddle" in this city. Twice a week the young men and boys of this school are on the street, in the evening, with a drum corps, drilling in Hardee's tactics. The city has forbidden the use of muskets in drill. But how long will it take a well-drilled squad in movements to become well versed in the manual of arms? A goodly number of this day and generation know only too well.

What is all this for? Can any reader of this paper tell why a body calling themselves Jesus-ites should be training in the art of war, when the declaration at the birth of the meek and lowly Jesus was, "Glory to God on earth, peace, and good-will to men." But whatever the answer, the drum corps annoys the residents of their street parade-ground.

I presume Will Hodge has reached Chicago ere this, but he cannot take away all the kind thoughts and memories he has left behind him in the hearts of both his old and new friends. He is, indeed, a zealous and earnest worker in the vineyard of the Spirit.

The exposure of the notorious Mabel Aber Jackman is fully endorsed by all true-hearted Spiritualists on this coast, as it must be everywhere.

Mrs. Nellie J. T. Brigham is expected to pass through this city early in June, on her way to Australia. It is also expected that she will speak here on Sunday, June 8. A rare treat is in store for us.

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

As Conducted by John W. Ring, at Galveston, Texas.

John W. Ring has taken a great interest in the Progressive Lyceum. His methods are worthy of imitation. He is certainly to be commended. The following will illustrate what he is doing in his Progressive Lyceum:

WHAT OUR SPIRIT FRIENDS ARE DOING.

Let us continue the theme of last Sunday and consider what it is possible that "Our Arisen Loved Ones" are doing. A life which is natural in a world that is tangible immediately conveys the idea of activity, of progression. The experiences of life mold character, in fact form lives, so our spirit friends must be completing the unfolding of their better natures by experiences in a sense similar to when here; it is necessary for them to come in touch with earthly conditions to thus unfold. They bring with them the sweet spiritual presence which adds brightness to our lives, and take in return the strong magnetic emanations from us. They go to school and learn, they congregate for lectures and for social enjoyment, each finding pleasure in the thing which he does. They pass to higher conditions by giving to one just below them the profit of their experiences.

INTERMEDIATE.

Death is the doorway to the world of spirit. Mortals lay off the body as if it were a garment, and yet the same persons pass into this spiritual state where they are called immortals; here they continue to grow to maturity. Children go to school and are taught how to influence people on the earth plane, and many other things which will make them useful in their world. The ideal there as it should be here is to be useful. If we neglect an opportunity to do good now, we may find it necessary to return to earth life and influence some person to do some deed of kindness.

LITTLE ONES.

Leader—You remember last Sunday the "little boy" came in spirit to his sister and played with her?

Children—Yes, and saved her from being run over by a wagon.

Leader—Well, what do you think "Our Arisen Loved Ones Are Doing?"

Children—Watching over us with loving care; and by helping us they are benefited just as we are, by doing good.

Leader—That is the thought, the spirit friends are often near us giving to us the love and peace that their spiritual state yields and receiving from us a force needed in their unfolding.

Children—Will our little friends be grown when we go to them in the spirit land?

Leader—Most likely, they grow very much as you do here.

"Day after day we think what they are doing
In those bright realms of air;
Year after year their tender steps pursuing,
Behold unfoldment there.

"Not as children shall we again behold them,
For when with rapture wild,
In our embrace we again enfold them,
Not one will be a child."

HELPS FOR LEADERS.

Describe Death as a kindly force, a gentle angel that takes away the short-sightedness of our mortal state and enables us to see and know our best nature. The important thing is to realize the possibility of being useful. Lilian Whiting said: "If one knew that a certain day of a certain week were to be his last, in this part of life, how generously, how thoughtfully and how tenderly would he live it. Then the question recurs, Why not so live now, each day, each week, each month, thus creating for one's self the most beautiful future?" In the next world we must undo all defective building and complete all neglected opportunities. It is well to finish our earthly career nobly, for when we are out of the body we must employ some other body through which to perform what may be necessary for us to do. A man begins to build a beautiful house; he knows full well how to fit each part to its place, but before he is finished he loses his right arm. He must employ other workmen and watch over them to perfect his ideas; and however attentive he may be, and however the men employed may endeavor to carry out his plans and instructions, it will not be quite like he had done the work himself. Death to an unfinished life is like the losing of a right arm, and the person must remain near the earth plane and influence someone with a body to do that which he should have done. This, at the best, is very unsatisfactory, and each man should endeavor to make this earth life complete by living each day in the exercise of the best powers which is his.

Impress the children with the importance of observing small things. Kindness to everyone, attention to parents' requests, etc., and thoughtfulness of others which will attract such spirit friends as will assist in the living of a noble life. Don't give too big ideas of life beyond; tell of marching, singing and studying birds, trees and flowers, which teach love to all life.

Rev. R. Heber Newton said, "There are different stages in the development of life—but they are only different stages in one and the same life. Whatever the next life may be, it will be no wholly new being. It will be this life carried on higher; but not another life at all, but one and the same life in nobler unfolding. The eternal life is here and now. The elements out of which our body is composed exist in the air about us in finer and subtler forms. From that surrounding atmosphere there can be drawn the materials to reclothe the spirit at its will, for as Tesla said in a remarkable article in the Century, "We can conceive of organized beings living without nourishment and deriving all the energy they need for the performance of their life functions from the ambient medium." (There exists a spiritual counterpart of everything which we are conscious of in this material world and evidently our spirit friends derive food and clothing from these spiritual emanations. Many times a crowd of apparently hungry spirits gather around a restaurant and are satisfied by the aroma of the food.) "The associations that group themselves naturally here must in higher and nobler form group themselves in the hereafter. Life without association is death. The physical transition that we call death can make no essential difference whatever in the spiritual reality that we call character. There will be hosts of undeveloped lives to be governed and ruled, to be taught and inspired." Ex-President Hill, of Harvard, when asked "What are you going to do when you enter the other life?" replied, "There are enough problems, mathematical problems, connected with the arc of a circle to keep me busy and happy for a thousand years." Rev. Minot J. Savage said, "Why should any of the magnificent souls of the world find themselves without occupation? Remember how many millions of little children are passing into this country every year. They would find nursing and care and be taught if they stayed here. I believe that they will need and find nursing and teaching and care and tenderest love over there. There are sainted souls, men and women both, who would not find themselves happy if there were not somebody to help, somebody to whom they could be of service." Lilian Whiting said, "In that realm are all the causes which on this plane appear as results." Andrew Jackson Davis said, "Every dweller in the spiritual world has guardian spirits superior in wisdom to himself, just as spirit guardians belong to every earthly being." "The Next World Interviewed" and "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands" are both excellent books to read on this subject. We must learn that the next world is a very natural place where each person does that which is necessary for his soul growth; few if any who pass to spirit life but find it necessary to return to the earth plane and influence the life of some mortal to which they are drawn by the natural law of attraction, to do the thing which they failed to do or to undo the thing which through thoughtlessness or ignorance was done by them while in the earth life.

IMPORTANT MOVEMENT.

Inaugurated by John W. Ring.

To the Readers of The Progressive Thinker:—My earnestness for the growth and advancement of our cause is my only apology for claiming your attention for a few statements concerning the Progressive Lyceum. There is no need of discussing the demand or the advantage of lyceum work; too long our good Editor has written of this, so I immediately proceed with the plan which is now being worked. Two-page lesson sheets will be issued, beginning with the first Sunday in September; the lesson matter will be "Life Studies," (a history of our faithful workers), which will give the history of the life and experiences of those who have labored for Spiritualism and in the earnestness of spirit have brought our cause to its present state of development. Cards will be issued each month in connection with the lesson leaf which will bear the picture and a favorite and original saying of the worker whose life is being considered. There will be five different verses, making we might say five different styles of cards. The price will be nominal and the necessities of the lyceum studied and fulfilled. These "Life Studies" are to accomplish much in not a few directions, the reader will be made familiar with the life and experiences of our most faithful workers, which will not only be interesting but instructive in enabling them to be more efficient workers for the great growth which is certain to come for our cause. They will benefit the worker, because he will be brought before the rising Spiritualists and the sweet perfume of children's minds will come an influence of strength and comfort.

Now I hope to hear from the various lyceums over the country for further information or with suggestions as to the furtherance of the movement. Favor me with a line to let me know that you have seen this notice, and then please keep the plan in mind, for thoughts are things and your thought will help to guarantee marked success.

JOHN W. RING.

NO BABIES IN HELL.

"The assembly" has recently met
To fashion a doctrine to teach us,
And dish out eternal wrath
In quantum sufficit to reach us.
In adjusting the classes to damn,
They have done exceedingly well
To credit Omnipotent power
With sending no babies to hell.

The kind mammas can now rest assured,
If their infants should early expire,
They'll be carried to regions above
And keep out of that horrible fire.
Aye! Escape not only the broiling,
But that horrible, sulphuric smell,
That all previous synods have told us
Plagued all the poor babies in hell.

It must be a relief to the devil
That the infants are taken away;
For now he can give more attention
To those who are aged and gray.
Perhaps John Calvin's among them,
For Swedenborg ventured to tell
That he saw the great preacher in limbo,
Who consigned the dear babies to hell.

How that hideous, infernal doctrine
Has made many a sad mother wild,
From fearing the mercy of heaven
Too scanty to cover her child.
Go tell such to sorrow no longer,
Their gloom and dejection dispel,
For the preachers have lately discovered
God sends no babies to hell.

STRONG PROOF.

Growth in the Spirit World

Is there growth in the spirit world? Do children who pass out of the mortal body in infancy grow to manhood and womanhood in the world of spirit. This is an unsettled question to the larger portion of humanity and a question that has often been asked me by investigators of the spiritual philosophy, for it is a theme that touches the hearts of the rich and poor alike.

I can assert most positively they do, as I have had not only once, but many times proof positive of the fact. But the time I now mention was given me through the mediumship of the great independent slate-writer, Dr. Will A. Mansfield. I was about the year 1893 at Lake Orion Camp, Michigan. He was eating dinner when I came to his boarding place and I had to wait about twenty minutes. When he came into the parlor, I requested a sitting with him, which was granted me, and we repaired to a small room upstairs.

Mr. Mansfield was at that time a perfect stranger to me, and before any manifestations took place, we held no conversation pertaining to any of my affairs, or concerning any of my friends or relatives, or otherwise, spirit or mortal. There was a good-sized table between us during all the sitting. The room was not darkened, but brightly illuminated by the noonday sun. But soon he commenced to describe and name relatives perfectly, and also different members of my spirit band; but I wish to mention especially my little sister, who lived in her mortal body only the short space of six months. He described her as a young lady, as she would have been, had she lived up to that present time, saying she had blue eyes and golden hair, which was correct. I mention this as all the rest of our family have dark hair and eyes, and if he had been guessing it would have been but natural he would have said she resembled me.

I had some slates that I purchased at a store in the town (for the medium carried no slates with him), and after preparing some pellets with questions written on them to my spirit friends, I took one of the closely folded papers, and after putting it between the slates, and tying my handkerchief around them, I held the slates on my right shoulder, and reaching across the table I just touched the hand of the medium with my left. The most tiny speck of a pencil point had also been placed between the slates, and soon I heard a sound as of writing, then a little later three raps, signifying the message was completed. With joy I opened the slates, and there I read a message from my sister. I believe that was the happiest moment of life experience.

She said, in part: "Dear sister, you know how small I was when I went away, but now see how nicely I can write," etc., signing her name at the close, also her spirit name, as she had written it to me many times, and no one but our family could possibly know. What greater or better proof could one ask or desire, given as this proof was under conditions absolutely fraud-proof. This was not all, I received much more that was truly wonderful, but all in connection with the subject in question.

The day following my mother had a sitting with the same medium, and my sister wrote to her also. The handwriting on the slates were identical. I stayed at home that day, so the medium could not see us together, so could not know she was a relative of mine. My sister spoke of me in her message, and of my brother, who was at that time four hundred miles away. She spelled his name correctly, and said she saw him every day. My brother did not know of the existence of this medium, or the medium of him. She told the name of the person who had been her teacher in spirit life, signing her name at the close. We have the slates in our possession now, and their value is beyond price to us, for the proof their contents give of the life beyond and the surety that our loved one lives, loves us, and waits for us in the beyond, for she said: "My darling mother, some sweet time we shall all be together, to part no more."

At another time this medium visited in my home, and when holding a light seance with a few friends present, my father was called to the cabinet and my sister materialized her hand, and taking the pencil my father gave her, she wrote a message on a tablet, tore it off, handed it to my father in a second of time. He could see the hand all the time it was writing. It was truly beautiful, full of love for us all, and signed "Your Loving Spirit Daughter."

All these messages we treasure as coming from one we so dearly love. They also teach a great truth, not only to us, but to all humanity; That the little ones in passing through the change called death, are tenderly cared for in spirit life by loving spirit mothers; are educated and taught to be workers for the human family; bearers of hope and cheer to their loved ones still in the mortal life. If we open our hearts to receive spirit truth we may often feel the presence of these little blossoms from the realm of spirit. They are brought day after day by their spirit guardians into the earth plane, into the home atmosphere, so earthly parents and dear ones are not forgotten; but they are taught to love us, and in time they may become a spirit guide to some one member of the family if you strive yourself to become in touch with the higher life.

I wish all fathers and mothers who have parted from their little ones might receive some consoling messages to comfort their hearts and make more bright their short stay on earth. Let everyone strive to know the truth concerning spiritual things, and so receive a rich harvest of blessings for this life and the life to come.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters From Prof. William Denton, Through the Mediumship of Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER SEVENTEEN.

There are those who may ask: "Is it all work and no play in the spheres, Mr. Denton?" and I answer emphatically: No!

With too many here, as elsewhere, it is all play and no work, but play and work should balance each other about evenly. No doubt you all remember the old adage: "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy; but all play and no work makes him a mere toy;" and this is as true of the spheres as of earth.

After accomplishing some task which I have set myself to do, I then seek amusement of some kind, for relaxation and rest, very much as you of earth do, for earth is simply a type of heaven.

We have pleasures here that are extremely lofty. Many pleasures of earth are very debasing, but the higher class of spiritual beings indulge in no debasing pleasures. The soul can rise, very rapidly, on lofty and grand pleasures. Our work must be, principally, with those beneath us; but our pleasures may ascend into the heights of wisdom and glory. We may descend and work with and for the degraded; we may ascend and take our pleasures with the angelic.

Now you all know that in the old-fashioned orthodox heaven, the saints in glory walk throughout eternity in streets paved with gold, they are clad in long, flowing, white garments, with long, graceful wings growing from the shoulder blades; they wear upon their heads crowns of gold, and they carry harps of gold in their hands, and we are not told that they have other employment than to pick the harp strings and sing psalms of praise to a majestic being, seated on a great white throne, whom they call God; and this they are supposed to do forever and forever. This kind of heaven has been destroyed for a great many of you, but there are yet thousands upon thousands who firmly believe in it—yea, millions on millions, no doubt. Now it is as necessary to demolish this heaven and destroy this God as it is to destroy hell and kill the Devil. After I have worked hard putting out the fires of hell and had a number of hard scratches with the Devil, I find great pleasure in a change of action, and take a spell up in heaven, and go hunting around for that great white throne, trying to spy out those golden streets, wondering where they keep all those harps and crowns, and where the great heap of white robes may be found, and I ask about every other one I meet, if they can discover any sprouts on my shoulder blades, anything at all which might be construed into feathers and growing wings? But, strange to tell, they one and all shake their heads dubiously and with a make-believe sad smile say, "nary a sprout," that is some of them say so, for there are many excellent spirits here very much like Dr. T. Wilkins of earth, they do like a little innocent fun, and to crack a sly joke is not considered undignified in the least, so long as it is pure and clean; and white robes, golden harps and crowns are pretty nice things; but the pity of it is, we can't any of us find them, and the wings won't grow, coax them as we will?

There are as many here who believe in the orthodox and Catholic heaven as there are on earth, and I may say more. If one asks them why they do not find themselves in such a heaven, they make various replies. Some say they are waiting for the angel Gabriel and his horn, which they expect to hear at any moment, then Christ will appear and all will be judged according to the deeds done in the body; the earth and the wicked will be burned up as chaff, then, together with their Savior, they will all descend upon the earth, which has been purified by fire, pure new bodies will be given them, and there they will live in heavenly harmony forevermore. Now we find it almost impossible to convince any of these people to the contrary; their sophistry captivates the mind and their reasoning is very fine. These are the hardest spirits we have to deal with, for their convictions are as firm as adamant.

Usually, after I have had a long siege of hard work among these people, I seek amusement and pleasure that I may recuperate and gain wisdom and strength for better and greater work. But first I think we ought to thoroughly understand what is meant by amusement, for amusement and pleasure may mean very different things, for one can take as much pleasure in hard work, and perhaps even more, than in idleness or amusement; yet it is pleasant to be idle and amused sometimes. Pleasure is one thing and amusement another.

Now I am sure you would all like to know how we amuse ourselves in the spheres, and if there are places of amusement as on earth? Your principal amusements of earth are balls, parties, receptions, theaters, concerts, operas, circuses, panoramas, and, of late, viviscopes and moving pictures. Ah! how I dreamed of those when I was there with you! I felt confident, then, that sooner or later the secret of producing them would be discovered, for my dear wife said, when reading psychometrically, that the pictures moved, somewhat like a panorama, before her eyes or inner sight. I often placed in her hands a good sized specimen of ore, rock, or mica, besides many other things, and she would read from them histories of past events, always saying the pictures moved; and we hinted in our book, "The Soul of Things," that moving pictures, thrown upon and reflected from stationary, stretched canvas, would yet be given to the world. I often illustrated my lectures with stereopticon views and always a feeling of disappointment would seize me that they could not be made to move. How happy I am that you are now in the enjoyment of that beautiful, delightful art. But it is not yet perfected. The time is not far distant when these moving pictures will be as true and perfect as the living scene itself, together with the sounds. For instance, a great singer will appear before you on the canvas, every motion perfect, together with the song and words.

The neigh and snort of the noble horse as he gallops past; the sound of the oars as a boat and oarsmen appear; the boom of the breakers on the shore; and so forth. A great lecturer will appear and deliver a grand oration. All things that transpire on your globe will be faithfully represented, together with their corresponding sounds. A great pianist at his piano; and thus of all other musicians, together with the sound of the music which they play.

You can all see for yourselves what a vast field is before you, so I need not specify further; but the highest and best of all will be when you get the telepathic or thought register.

You have already got wireless telegraphy. One step more and you will have the thought register perfected. We are working hard for this now. The human brain is already a thought register; so are the brains of animals and birds. Look at your horse, cat, dog, and bird, earnestly until you think they are under your hypnotic power and then silently will them to do this or that as you desire, and mark how they will obey your slightest wish; then say, if you can, that they have no souls.

The very sensitive through whom we are writing now, can silently will his horse to go this way or that, as it pleases him, without a motion or word. Try it, you who do not believe that animals have minds or souls. It is by thought registration that we are able to write these letters. Our thoughts are received and registered on the brain of the medium. It is telepathic communication and thought registration.

In making a thought register one must study the construction of the brain; there must be moist convolutions; but we are not able to give the invention through this medium; but there are many others. It is through such mediums as Tesla and Edison, not through a musician.

Now, after what I have said, you must see that in order to be amused, we are not obliged to travel long distances, for every thought, every act, every sound that has ever been given forth by the greatest and wisest, are all registered within the ether, to be heard, seen and read by all who are capable of understanding them; consequently we never lack for amusement; still, we have theaters, concerts, balls, parties, lectures, and a thousand and one things that I may not be able to describe through a mortal mind at present; but all the amusements here are intended to instruct and guide in wisdom's ways, as they should do on earth. When I was with you in the form, the amusements and recreations I loved best were those of roaming in the wild-woods and sunning myself on the banks of meandering streams, but I cared little for the cruel hook and line. I own up to catching butterflies and other insects, confining them for awhile and then setting them at liberty. I was not cruel, but simply wished to study them and their habits, and often took a beetle on the end of my finger, gazed steadily into its bright, black eyes, wondering how much it really knew; and must tell you that I often tamed a number of the little creatures and made them follow me like tiny dogs. To be sure this was in my young manhood; greater things held my attention later in life; but yet I could say a great deal about animal and insect life if it would be acceptable to the public. Perhaps later on I shall have much to tell of the fauna and flora of the world on which you now live. It is a subject of intense interest to me and ever will be.

But to go back to my amusements. I was so constituted that when lying upon the grass, or sitting down by the brook to amuse myself, I would wonder how it might be in that other and fairer world; were there grass, flowers, trees, animals, insects, and birds there as here? And just as these thoughts would persist in forcing themselves into my mind, a beautiful little songster would commence to trill his song; he would sing and trill in a perfect ecstasy of delight, and the delight would pierce my breast and vibrate through all the convolutions of my brain. If it happened to be on a sunny afternoon, the soft moo of the cow over her frisking calf would strike my ear; the musical hum of the insects and the chirp of the August cricket; the brook babbled softly; the pine trees sighed with delight as the gentle breeze swept through them. Could that other world be more beautiful than this? And there reclining until the sun sunk in glory behind the western hills, then the soft hush of twilight, and at length the evening star, and afterward the whole galaxy of whirling orbs. O, wonder! O, beauty—beauty beyond description.

I was getting well on in the middle of life; so-called death must come sooner or later. O, that my eyes might pierce the vail—that I might understand just how it might be over there, up there, or down there. It was all one and the same. It was out there in space somewhere. Did that which some call God give these beautiful things to earth and withhold them from that which some called heaven? Dear reader, I could never quite make up my mind just how it would be in that other life; but for me, if there were no flowers, grass, trees, animals, insects, birds, and so forth, what should I do? Certainly my delightful amusements would be at an end. To give them up would be much harder for me than death, for death I did not dread. Should I then nevermore behold a flower, a tree, a shrub; never look again upon the emerald earth; nevermore hear or see a bird, insect or animal? The thought was often more than I could bear, and hurrying home to my beloved, ask her what she could see, and she would reply: "William, I see the soul of things; not simply the souls of men and women, but the soul of things;" and, dear friends, if you have never read our book—my beloved's and mine—go and purchase it, for I have found it to be true. Everything that you have on the earth, even to a blade of grass, possesses a soul.

That little beetle which I held on my finger, had a soul; that sweet songster that so delighted me, had a soul; every blade of grass, on which I lay, possessed a soul; the stately tree was not soulless; every drop of water within the gurgling brook held a drop of soul.

Ah! happy William. My beloved spoke the truth. Things had souls. It is the soul of things that causes all things to be; for without soul and spirit they cannot be. You say, some of you, that you do not know how things grow; by what power the blade of grass shoots up from the germ; how it is that the tree grows from a seed; how it is that the little bird is generated from a germ within the sperm; and thus of all insects and animals. Life—together with man—the life is the germ thereof and the soul of the germ is the life thereof. Without the germ nothing can be, and without the soul within the germ the germ cannot be. The soul germ descends from the soul realm, enters and covers itself with matter; there it grows or develops until it has no further need of its covering of matter which conceals but half reveals its beauty; it then throws it off and returns to its former home in the soul realm, not as a germ, however, but as a developed and beautiful entity; and here the great natural laws pick them all up, preserve and string them like so many jewels. The great natural law of affinity—or like attracts like—forms a spiritual and soul world with all material coarseness dropped out, with all the spiritual attributes of beauty, form, color; with all the soul attributes of intelligence, love, truth and wisdom left. Thus you see that we have green fields, forests, flowers, fruits, land and water, birds, insects and animals in their ethereal and most perfect forms, and I am able to seek my amusements as formerly. I still lie on the green sward. I still follow the babbling brook. I still try to discover the secrets of nature and have discovered very many more than I knew on earth.

* * * * * * * * *

Now the medium has just been reading in a Spiritual paper a short article that has left such an impression on the mind that I shall be obliged to answer it before going on with my subject.

The writer of the article asks, and very pertinently: "Of what use are animals in the spirit world? Do they progress as man does? Do they evolute into self-conscious beings, or do they remain dumb unthinking things, subject to the wills of masters, throughout all time? Where is the savant who will give the correct reply to these queries?" I do not know that I can justly call myself a savant, but if you will take the word of William Denton, I think I can, and am qualified to answer your questions.

First: "Of what use are animals in the spirit world?"

The person who asks this question supposes that all things in nature are for man's use alone, and that which he cannot make use of does not exist, or if it does exist it is of no account whatever and becomes exceedingly obnoxious to him, and he wonders why it exists at all.

Now there were countless millions of animals on the earth ages before man's advent upon it; they did not exist for man, they existed for themselves; their lives were as sweet to them as man's life is to him; they are as perfect in their own way as man is in his. The great mistake is that man, in his egotistical selfishness, thinks them dumb, unthinking creatures, simply endowed with what he calls instinct. When man becomes wiser he will see what a great mistake he made. Animals are not unthinking creatures as man supposes. They think equally with man as far as they are able to; their thoughts are sufficient for their condition—for the circumscribed sphere in which they move. By what right do men call animals dumb? I, William Denton, never saw or heard of a dumb animal or a deaf one unless it became so through some accident or misfortune. The language of animals does not reach the same altitude as that of human beings, I admit, but the same species understand each other perfectly; moreover, they understand very much of the language spoken to them by man. If animals do not understand the language of men, why does a driver talk to his horse? He says to him, "whoa," or "go-long," and a great many other words. He expects the horse to understand him, and if he doesn't obey his spoken language he sometimes kicks, beats and abuses him. If a horse has no reason and does not think, how can one expect him to obey? The horse is more worthy of the sweetness of his own life than the man who swears at him, kicks, beats and abuses him. The horse has no vices. He eats sweet hay and drinks cold water; he neither chews, smokes, gets drunk, nor indulges in other vices or crimes. He does not, as a rule, kill other horses. He certainly does not go to war and slay his kind by tens of thousands, nor shoot other innocent animals for "the fun of the thing." He is usually docile, faithful and obedient, although his great strength would enable him to slay many men. Mark his intelligent, bright eyes; his proudly arched neck; the beauty of his form; the agile swiftness of his gait. Treat him kindly and mark what a loving, faithful, intelligent creature he is; how beautiful in his own way; how perfect as a horse, not as a man, but as a horse. The horse has as good a right to his life and his way as a man has to his. His language is to him sufficient for his condition. He neights, snorts, and whinnies, in many different keys and tones, besides he has many other ways of expressing himself, enough for all the purposes of his life.

Now what I have said about the horse will apply to all other animals, each species in their own way, not one is dumb, not one that does not speak his own language in his own way. Are the birds dumb? Listen to their sweet songs that rival the human singer. Are the insects dumb? Listen to their music on a bright summer afternoon, shortly before sundown; and the frogs and tree-toads make night melodious. Listen to the hoot of the owl, whose cry is often mistaken for that of a human being, the lowing of the kine, the bleating of the sheep, the barking of the dogs, and their cousins the coyotes.

Dumb? Why, nothing is dumb. All creatures have language sufficient for themselves; each understands his kind, and in fact each kind understands the language of many other kinds. Put a common house-fly under a microscope and see what it reveals.

Second Question: "Do animals evolve into self-conscious beings?"

How is it possible for one to ask such a question? Self-conscious? Why, every self that ever breathed is conscious of its self, is conscious of its own life, and also the lives of others. Try to catch and kill any animal and one will soon find out whether it is self-conscious or not. It will do its best to try to save its life and get away from one. Hear its pitiful cries when one captures it and tries to wring its neck or kill it in other ways. Listen to the dying cries of a pig; listen to the frenzied roar of a cow or bull; hear the pitiful bleat of the sheep or lamb; and thus one might go on. All life is conscious of its own life—or self-conscious, and when man becomes a little wiser he will be conscious of the self-consciousness of others, whether of men or animals.

There was a time when men thought that women had no souls. Well, they have discovered that they were mistaken. There was a time when they thought that women were made expressly for their use and abuse, just as they think animals are now; but they will shortly find out their mistake.

Animals do not exist expressly for man's use or abuse, no more than does woman. That man uses and abuses both, is also true; but he will eventually become wiser.

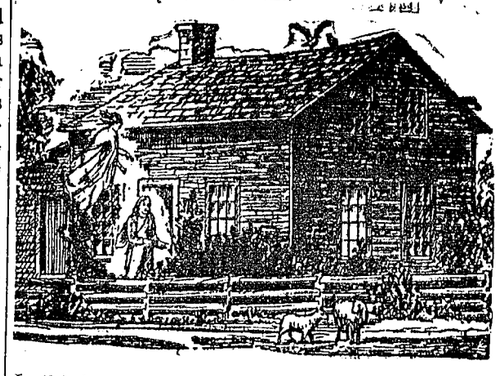
Third Question: "Do animals remain subject to the wills of masters throughout all time?" Now we shall be obliged to define the word master in order to answer the question.

Masters throughout all time? The word master does not always mean a wise man; does not always mean a loving man; does not always mean a good and perfect man; and it can as often be applied to a villain as to a good, moral, upright man. The master and his slave. A man can be the master of the most perfect and beautiful Caucasian female slave who ever lived; one can master a cooing dove; a lovely singing bird; an octoroon, or even Topsy. One can be a Legree if one chooses. He was quite a grand master. He could master Uncle Tom and whip him to death. A man can master his wife, if he feels inclined, for he has more physical strength than she has; he can, and often does, make of her a poor, trembling slave; he can beat and abuse her until she nearly loses the resemblance to a beautiful woman; he can make of her a servile drudge, obedient to his slightest whim or desire; in fact, masters can make devils of themselves and old Satan is supposed to be the master of hell. Now when a man becomes exceedingly wise he ceases to be a master—mastering and overpowering the wills of others. When he becomes exceedingly wise and exceedingly loving, he becomes exceedingly kind, and in loving kindness he tries to teach and gently lead, not master. The wise man discovers beauty and goodness in all things; the loving man loves all things; the wise and loving man soon discovers that his wife has a soul as well as himself; that her soul is also equally as good as his own and as worthy of heaven; and I have known men who thought their wives a little better than themselves; but of course such men are very rare. I have known men who thought it wrong to keep slaves, and if they hired someone to perform labor for them they did not consider themselves masters and the men slaves subject to their wills, but treated the men kindly, paid them their dues, and never doubted but the men had souls as well as themselves. I have known men who made use of their horses in the same way. They did not pay them money for the labor they performed, for they knew the horse had no use for money, but they paid the horse in loving kindness for the use of his great strength, they took good care of him, gave him plentifully of good food and water, patted him softly, talked to him gently, never abused him in any way, while the man's thought said, and the horse understood telepathically, "Dear old fellow, we are not master and slave, we do not hold that relation to each other; my brain is somewhat larger than yours, my soul is a little higher up the scale of being, but that does not hinder us from being comrades to a certain degree. If my brain is larger than yours, your strength is greater than mine; kindly loan me your strength, for which I will repay you by giving you all that you require as a horse—and, my good fellow, the same law created you that created me, and by the same law, if I am immortal so are you; if I am a little wiser than you I should turn that wisdom in the direction of understanding you and myself—understanding the relation that exists between me and all other animals. I have no right to become a cruel, devilish master, and you my abused slave, simply because I have the power. I have the power to abuse and even murder my fellow-men, but I have no right to do so, and as a wise man I could not."

Here in the spirit world the relation between man and animals is not precisely the same as on earth. The horse no longer toils for man, but he is a creature of life and beauty, bounding over the plains and far reaches; his life is as sweet, joyful and dear to him, as is man's to him. Why animals come into existence I do not know any more than I know why men did. That they are intelligent, immortal and beautiful, is as true as that men and women are. That they are not on the same plane as men and women, is also true. Take all living things off the earth except men, women and children, and what a dreary, lifeless desert it would be. Take all life out of the spirit spheres except that of the human spirit, and what a desolate, mournful waste it would be. You ask: "Of what use are animals in the spirit world?" To fill desolate, void wastes with life and beauty for one thing; and if this were for man's pleasure alone the use would be incalculable. Man ceases to slay and eat animals in the spirit world. On the earth, at the present time, he is so degraded, or low in the scale, that anything he cannot slay and eat he considers to be of no use whatever. Creatures he can enslave to do his hard, dirty work, and abuse while they are thus toiling for him, he thinks can have no souls; but many men are far more wise, and the more wisdom they have they discover that life and beauty are sweet in and of themselves, and the higher man rises in the scale of being, the greater and more refined his pleasures. Sweet music appeals to his sense of hearing and makes him happy, and the beauty and sweetness of the singing birds give him exquisite pleasure, and the more exalted in spirit, the more pleasure he derives from them, not only the birds but the sweetly chirping insects, frogs and tree-toads.

A flower is exquisitely beautiful to his sight, as are the shrubs, grass and trees. The more exalted his spirit or soul, the greater and more intense his pleasure as he rests or walks upon the soft and beautiful turf and gazes at the trees, flowers, and shrubs—the more exalted his soul, the more exalted and beautiful all life becomes to him.

Gentle reader, without soul there is no life.



Ever your well wisher and friend,

SPIRIT WILLIAM DENTON.

OUR HYDESVILLE HOME.

The Birthplace of Modern Spiritualism Now in Ruins.

In this homely little cottage there occurred the greatest birth
That has ever been recorded in the annals of the earth.
There began the real knowledge of the spirit's future state,
And a knowledge that our loved ones only linger at the gate;
Yes, a knowledge that the doorway to the future is ajar,
And we need not longer wonder where our friends and kindred are.

In this rustic little cottage where the Foxes had their home,
Came the spirit of a peddler in his rounds of conscious roam,
And he heard the children playing after they had gone to bed,
Then he rapped upon the footboard, and he rapped upon the head;
He persisted in this rapping till they heard, then all were still,
Then that peddler went to rapping with an added strength of will.

When at last the door was opened and the children talked to him,
And the household, long in darkness as to death that looked so grim,
Like the budding flowers welcome both the sunshine and the rain,
They just welcomed that old peddler, and then bade him call again:
Well, he called, and rapped and chatted, and more wisely than he knew,
And the curtains of the future, through his chatting there withdrew.

In the dear old Hydesville cottage where the Fox girls lived when small,
Came the knowledge that the future is eternal life for all,
And all lovers of this knowledge who are true to truth and right,
Must ever feel the sacredness of cottage and of site.
We may differ in opinions of the small things in our code,
But the facts about the future are from seeds those children sowed.

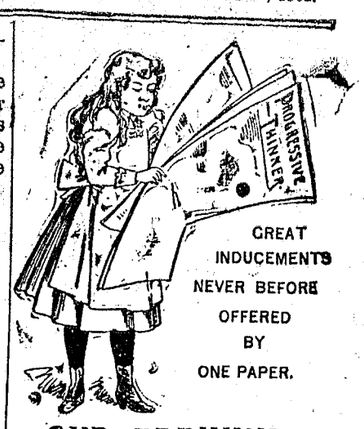
Though the wind has blown the cottage to destruction, it remains
In the minds of all as freshly, and its reverence attains
To a higher place as yearly, with our hearts brimful of glee,
We assemble to do homage to the birthplace of the three,
Who in innocence of childhood caught those messages of love
From the peddler who discovered he had only gone above.

Oh, the dear, decayed old cottage has succumbed to age and time,
But in death it grows more sacred and its mem-ry more sublime.
Let us gather up the fragments that are strewn about the earth,
Of that blessed home where spirit of a mortal proved its birth;
Let us place them where the children that will follow in the race
Will observe their sacred presence and be filled with loving grace.

DR. T. WILKINS.

TWO VIEWS OF DEATH.

I.



Oh, Death! Thou mystery so deep,
That lulls all mortal forms to sleep,
And charms away the vital spark,
And leaves the "temple" lone and dark,
That once was radiant with light
Ere it was withered by thy blight!
What is the secret of thine art
That quickly stills the pulsing heart;
Commands the blood to cease its flow
And never more to give its glow.
And flush of beauty to the cheek,
While pallid lips refuse to speak;
And sparkling eyes whose radiant glance
Did like the dewdrop, glint and dance
And make the beauteous face to shine
With loving spirit so divine?
All is withdrawn by thee, O, Death!
When thou dost take the mortal breath
And cast it forth upon the wind—
Thou mystery to all mankind!

II.

Sweet Death! thou standest now revealed,
Since thy "deep mystery" is unsealed,
A friend indeed, to all mankind,
Who in thine arms a solace find
From pain and sickness, want and woe,
That with this mortal life must go.
And when these earthly days are spent,
And nothing mundane gives content,
Thou art the messenger of love
That lifts the veil to scenes above,
And wafts us o'er the mystic sea,
To realms of life more broad and free,
Where old-time friends will meet with cheer
The kindred souls they hold so dear;
And onward still the course pursue,
Through fields of pleasure ever new,
Where endless progress beckons on,
And all of life is never won.
With such a knowledge, who can weep
O'er tired bodies wrapped in sleep?

Read This Carefully Before Re-Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These nine books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $2.75, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible in The Progressive Thinker office only. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, in view of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

"Mediumship and Its Development, and How to Mesmerize to Assist Development." By W. H. Bach. Especially useful to learners who seek to know and utilize the laws of mediumship and development, and avoid errors. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

THE OCCULT FORCES.

The Strange Case of Genevieve Elliott.

Is it possible for one to be auto-hypnotized?

This question, while not paramount to the people at large, has been agitating the ranks of science for years.

Can you hypnotize yourself, and that being possible, can you again regain your normal state of mind?

Science declares the first possible, but Dudley avers the impossibility of the second.

In the direct face of all scientific assertion, contrary to all precedent, Dr. Frank Davis, of 134 North New Jersey street, this city, has just succeeded in one of the most wonderful mental operations on record.

He has proven the existence of the power of auto-hypnotism.

He has succeeded in overcoming that superhuman power of individual will and in recalling the scattered senses of the objective mind.

Several weeks ago Miss Genevieve Elliott, an Indianapolis girl, attended a hypnotic entertainment. While none of the more serious questions of the subject was asked by the operator, Miss Elliott was deeply impressed with the experiments and demonstrations she had witnessed.

Infinite possibilities of the subjective mind, as illustrated by the hypnotist, fascinated her. She was a devout Christian, an interested worker in the church and a firm believer in heaven. When the theories of clairvoyance were explained to her she expressed a desire to taste of the experience.

In a short time she began to manifest unusual symptoms. At times she appeared to be occupied in deep meditation from which it was impossible to arouse her. Then again a tendency toward extraordinary demonstrations of affection or dislike was exhibited. Her parents became alarmed. The family physician was summoned and prescribed for her.

In spite of the remedies he offered, however, two weeks ago Miss Elliott fell into a deep slumber which continued for three days.

From this sleep the physicians were unable to arouse her.

At the end of the three days Miss Elliott awoke from her slumber and fell into convulsions. Her delirium was painful to witness, and, worst of all, there seemed no relief for the stricken girl.

"O! why am I hypnotized!"

"Please get my mind back for me!"

These were the startling burden of the moans that greeted those gathered about her bedside.

All the efforts of the physicians, even those who were specialists in nervous diseases, were of no avail.

Several days ago Dr. Davis learned of the case. He immediately called upon the parents and requested permission to undertake a cure. The request granted he began to work upon the afflicted girl.

For four days and far into the night of each he labored by her bedside.

Upon the fifth day she slept peacefully.

Now she is entirely cured.

What was her condition?

How was she cured?

This case finds a parallel in that of young Edwin Devere, at present an inmate of the insane asylum at Schuylkill Haven, Pa.

Devere's condition is very critical; at any moment he is expected to succumb to his horrible mental disease.

Has he been hypnotized?

Does he only believe he was hypnotized?

Has he hypnotized himself?

These three questions are puzzling the physicians. They will probably never be answered for the boy's insanity is so violent and persistent that there is little likelihood of his ever again regaining his reason.

In his delirium he cries frequently, and has for some time:

"I told that man not to hypnotize me."

"I don't want to be hypnotized!"

Over and over again these cries are uttered. They have given rise to the suspicion that the boy has been hypnotized and that he will so remain until the man who placed him in the state of hypnotic slumber is found to relieve him.

Devere lived at Pottsville, Pa., and was affected first on April 22. At his home the previous evening his parents noticed that he was apparently excited. He was nervous when he went to bed. The next morning he was worse and in the afternoon became unconscious. All efforts of local physicians were futile.

The symptoms are of acute hysteria rather than of hypnosis. It is supposed that after seeing a hypnotist operate the novelty of the thing impressed Devere, and he gradually absorbed the idea that he was hypnotized.

If he is self-hypnotized, query arises, Can he withdraw himself from the condition?

The doctors in charge of his case say not. They think it impossible to reduce his delirium and fear that he will never be so near normal that his mind may be diverted from the hypnotic belief.

Contrary to this is the demonstration of Dr. Davis in a case in every particular similar to Devere's.

It appears that Dr. Davis has solved a scientific problem.

This is the explanation.

Miss Elliott says she hypnotized herself by continually thinking the act possible and desiring to place herself in the state known as clairvoyance.

"For some time," she says, "I was delighted with my experience. I seemed to be borne through the air on billows of fleecy clouds. All the visions of the celestial worlds I ever had appeared before me in accentuated and beautified semblance. Words fail me in describing all I saw. I will never forget my experience.

"In the midst of my delightful travels the thought came to me, how shall I return?—for I wanted to do that very thing in spite of all the grandeur of my aerial environment.

"I tried to so influence myself—but failed. Then the significance of my position burst upon me. My thoughts grew incoherent. I fell into delirium. I seemed to be losing all hold upon my faculties of reasoning. While my body was perfectly healthy my mind was slowly dying.

"Then came an influence that impelled me to the right. For some time I fought it, but gradually succumbed to its workings.

"At length I awoke in the midst of my loved ones, cured of a fate worse than death. Concisely, that is my experience. I cannot begin to describe the beauty, the greatness, the horror and awfulness of my clairvoyant condition."

The secret of the cure was the hypnotic or subjective mind power of Dr. Davis, which overcame that of Miss Elliott.

In the words of the hypnotist: "He drew her back to her normal condition by the process of subjective suggestion, known as hypnotism."

"It is obvious," says Dr. Davis, "that the subjective mind is amenable to control by suggestion during natural sleep, just the same as it is during hypnotic, or induced, sleep. It would seem to be reasonably well established that the state of natural sleep is the best possible condition for the reception of telepathic suggestions. This is a fact, but the operator is just as successful with those who are in a state of hypnosis, even if it is self-afflicted. It is seldom that subjective power is manifested as in the case of Miss Elliott. It was with surprise that I succeeded as well as I did in her case."

It is shown that people can hypnotize themselves, but let the adventurous beware, for if the right man is not to be had who can tell what would be the outcome of this auto-experience?—Indianapolis Sentinel.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

On the Message of the Medium.

Boston, Mass.

Dear Mrs. Wilcox:—A party went to a "Spiritualistic meeting" at the corner of Exeter and Newbury streets, Boston, and in the course of the speaker's discourse he remarked that you are a Spiritualist.

The "spirits" came in great profusion, with an immense sheet thrown over them in Egyptian style (?)

We think it the greatest humbug ever perpetrated on the public, and would thank you to give your views on such nonsense. We hardly think it credible that such an enlightened person as yourself could really believe that the woman under the sheet came from another world, yet such was the assertion of the speaker.

These "spirits" are nicely behaved all the week, only appearing for a few moments Sunday nights.

SUDBURY.

I have attended similar meetings in Boston and elsewhere, and never saw anything which impressed me as other than rank blasphemous fraud.

A lady once took me to a "materializing" seance and assured me her dead daughter appeared to her there every week. She was an educated and gifted woman, with a beautiful daughter on earth, whose life I knew more about than did her mother.

The "spirit" of the dead girl was finally announced, in a darkened room, and a more ridiculous performance was never perpetrated upon credulous sorrow. Save for the notoriety attached to such a situation, I would have turned on the lights and unmasked the blasphemers, whose tricks were palpable to any sane mind.

I urged my friend to give her time and attention to her living daughter, and leave God to care for the spirit of the one who had passed on.

The lady thought me "unsympathetic" and prejudiced, and continued her devotion to the "materializations," while her living daughter was on the road to ruin in less than a year through the lack of maternal vigilance and affection.

Nevertheless I believe that the spirits of our dear ones do at times return to us, to comfort, guide and cheer.

I believe hundreds of well authenticated instances exist where these spirit forms have been seen—not in darkened rooms, under linen sheets, but in broad light, and in their own likeness.

I believe thousands of instances have occurred where messages have been received from them, and I have no doubt that we are often visited by departed friends, whose presence we vaguely feel, but whom we cannot see or hear.

Since such visitations are our only absolute proof of a future life, I fail to understand why religious people cry out against a belief in spirit return.

The Bible is full of such occurrences, and God's universe is the same to-day as it was in those historic times.

Meantime I feel that since the spirit life is the more advanced life, we should not intrude upon its higher usefulness by continual attempts to bring our friends back to earth. Let them make the advances.

It is easily understood how one in great bereavement haunts the mediums and clairvoyants, hoping for a message from a dear one to break the awful silence of the grave.

That such messages have been received I have no doubt.

That I myself have received them I am confident, but such occurrences have been rare, while my investigations have been frequent.

Many messages given are clearly the result of mental telepathy—the mind of the medium receiving the intense desire of the visitor and giving it back as a communication from the spirit world.

There is no questioning the fact that some people are endowed with what might be termed a spiritual telephone, just as others have mechanical, musical or mathematical genius.

But even as the earthly telephone at times is unreliable, and "Central" does not always make the right connections, so these spiritual wires are not always to be relied upon.

It is foolish, dangerous and wrong to appeal to our friends who have passed into another world for advice and counsel upon every earthly subject. Nothing but harm can result from a constant effort to bring back disembodied spirits. They have their own work to do, and we are here to work out our own destinies, to decide our own problems and to live our own lives. No one in this world or the next can do these things for us.

We are scholars in school, and we must not appeal to the graduates to come back from the busy world to give us the answers to all life's problems.

The moment those endowed with the power to communicate with spirit realms use those powers as a means of earning money they become unreliable for obvious reasons. We have only to observe the most invariable mental and physical degeneration of the professional medium to realize that the Creator never intended such gifts to be used for material gain.

I am confident we are all often surrounded by bands of invisible forces, spirits in various phases of development who are interested in our welfare.

They are God's messenger's, sent to cheer and help struggling humanity.

Call upon them—believe in them, but keep away from the materializing seance and let your visits to the professional medium be rare.

Believe in your own divine self and in the God of Love, and all will be well with you.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in Chicago American.

IN THE OCCULT.

Peculiar Incidents in Dreamland.

A lady dreamed frequently of a strange house, until it became as familiar to her as if she lived in it, and she would describe it to her husband until he knew it too. One day they went to see a house in the country which they thought of taking for the summer on the strength of the agent's description. When they arrived they found it perfectly familiar. "Why," said the husband, "it's your dream house." They liked it none the worse for that and took it. They were perfectly satisfied with it, but learned that it had the reputation of being haunted. However, they were in no wise disturbed and ran contentedly to the end of their tenancy. On leaving they saw the agent and told him that the only thing they were disappointed in was that they never saw the ghost. "Oh, no," he said, "we knew you would never see the ghost." "What do you mean?" said the lady. "I mean that you are the ghost that people have always seen there." An excellent story.—London Standard.

PREMONITION OF DEATH.

It develops that Miss Pattie Mangum, who died at her home some miles from Durham, N. C., last week, and who was the last survivor of one of the most prominent families of North Carolina, had her death revealed to her in a dream the night before it occurred, and she partially prepared herself for the grave, although she was in about her usual condition.

On waking at the accustomed hour she took a little coffee in bed, as usual, and told her niece that she had dreamed of her own death during the night, and that her taking off had been easy. After arising and preparing her toilet for the day, Miss Mangum fell forward, dying almost instantly.

It was found that in anticipation of her death she had dressed her hair and donned part of her grave clothes.

Contrary to the usual custom, Miss Mangum's grave was made north and south. Years before her death she had requested that she be buried at the feet of her illustrious parents, and it was in compliance with this request that the unusual mode was adopted.—Atlanta Constitution.

LENGTH OF A DREAM.

How long does a dream last? To the dreamer they sometimes seem to endure for hours, and the general impression is that they continue for minutes at least, while the fact is that the longest dream appears to be confined within a solitary second, even though the events of it may impress the dreamer for days.

Three physicians were discussing the matter in Bellevue Hospital a day or two ago, when one of them related a strange experience.

"Yesterday afternoon," he said, "I called to see a patient, and, much to my satisfaction, I found him sleeping soundly. I sat by his bed, felt of his pulse without disturbing him and waited for him to awaken. After a few minutes a junk dealer's cart, with discordant ringing bells, turned into the street, and as their first tones reached us my patient opened his eyes.

"'Doctor,' he said, 'I'm glad to see you, and awfully glad that you woke me, for I have been tortured by a most distressing dream, that must have lasted for several hours. I dreamed that I was sick, as I am, and that my boy came into the room with a string of most horribly sounding sleigh bells and rang them in my ears, while I hadn't power to move or speak to him. I suffered tortures for what appeared to be an interminable time. I'm glad you awoke me.'

"The ringing of those bells for one second had caused all of that dream, and just at the waking moment."—New York Herald.

SPIRITS INCITE MUSIC.

Great Masters of the Past Return to Earth.

MRS. SPENCER THE MEDIUM—SHE DEVELOPS GIFT FOR PIANO PLAYING FOR WHICH SHE CAN ACCOUNT IN NO OTHER WAY.

"A musical medium," say those who believe in spirits of the dead returning to earth.

"The reincarnation of a great musician," assert the theosophists, meaning that a soul of one who has long passed away may have come back for another concert tour.

Mozart, Chopin, Beethoven, Liszt—back in this world for a little try at a modern piano—these are the explanations friends of Mrs. Ellen Spencer give of her gift for improvisation which is said to have come suddenly one evening and changed her from a mediocre performer to a skillful one. She herself inclines to the Spiritualistic view, although she is loath to say so.

PLAYS MUSIC SHE NEVER HEARD

"I have a peculiar gift," is the modest admission she makes. "It came to me when I was about 17 years old, although it has developed and I am able to play much better now than I could then. I have never studied harmony or composition, am unable to retain a piece in my mind and could not write it out if I did. I do not think about the music at all, but allow my hands to move as they will and the melody comes. It is not playing by ear, because I play things I have never heard or dreamed of. I can play for hours without getting tired."

Ravenswood is the home of the pianiste and so benighted and unappreciative has that part of Chicago been that its talented daughter has lived there for years, playing her marches, sonatas, rhapsodies, without arousing more than passing comment. She is the daughter of the late Judge W. K. McAllister of the Supreme Court of Illinois, an old resident of Chicago. Albion, N. Y., was her birthplace and her early girlhood was spent in Waukegan, where she was married to William C. Spencer, who died three months after the wedding.

LIVES IN THE OLD HOMESTEAD.

Mrs. Spencer is comparatively young and lives with her sister, Miss McAllister, at 2454 North Paulina street, the McAllister homestead. Both the judge and his wife have passed away. The house is a roomy, pleasant place, the large, old-fashioned parlors echoing to the tones of the grand piano as played by Mrs. Spencer, or, if the theories be correct, to the materialized spirits of the masters.

Birds carol their songs in the fine old trees outside and the sisters tell of their liking for their feathered friends and especially for robins, which seem more numerous than other kinds and of which Judge McAllister was especially fond. A whip-poor-will has its home there and with these birds as a theme Mrs. Spencer has played some of her most beautiful airs. Given any subject—a storm at sea, a June morning, anything capable of musical interpretation—she plays. Sometimes she gives a musical description of the life of her listener. Strangers get her to do this, regarding it as both a record of the past and a prophecy.

SPIRITS MOVE HER HANDS.

"And the evening this gift came—what of that?" was asked?

"We were alone in the room—my sister, another girl and I—and as any girls might do for fun we sat around a table and tried to call up spirits. Suddenly my hands began to move as if I were playing a piano. I had been able to play a little, a very little, but that night I played brilliantly for hours, and my mother and father were amazed when they heard me, for with all my love for music before I had never been able to memorize a thing. About this time I began to go through wrist and finger exercises for strengthening those members and these were not voluntary exercises either. Some force compelled me to do it. Soon that ceased and now whether I practice or not my fingers do not grow stiff."

Mrs. Spencer's hands are those of a practical housewife, short, broad and plump. Her appearance is pleasing, her manners gentle and unassuming. She says her life is somewhat secluded, but in no way different from that of any other woman in her position.

"I have never played much in public," she said, "I have never known how to turn my gift to pecuniary gain. It has been enough for me to play for the entertainment of my friends and for my own enjoyment."—Chicago Daily News.

THE BLUE AND THE GRAY.

To-day a nation weeps in silence,
In common sympathy for all;
The Blue, the Gray alike are reverenced,
Who bravely fell 'mid shot and ball.
Go bring your best, your richest trophies,
And spread them o'er the silent graves;
Go bring your best, your sweetest flowers,
A tribute for the fallen braves.

Now let me weave two telling garlands,
To deck the lonely graves to-day,
And let all hostile thoughts be banished,
While we lament the blue and gray.
'Twas all the same, the pain and sorrow
The North and South was made to share;
'Tis all the same, the line, the furrow
Drawn deeply on the brow of care.

How many a fond and loving mother,
Weeps o'er the grave of some dear boy;
She loved him as she loves none other,
He was her pride, her life, her joy.
Long, long ago how she caressed him,
But when she heard the nation's call,
Amid fast-falling tears she blessed him,
And gave him, though he was her all.

Go bring your tributes, bring your flowers,
And spread them o'er the lonely graves;
Go, gather from the leafy bowers,
To-day be mindful of the braves.
And while you thus their memory cherish,
Oh, drop a silent tear for those
Who for the right did nobly perish,
Whose graves are in the Sunny South.

There none to-day will strew sweet flowers,
Not e'en a stone now marks the spot;
Where all the loyal Blues lie buried
Is known alas, to none but God.
There side by side on slope and mountain
Their bodies rest, the Blue and Gray;
'Tis all the same, for none can count them,
No one can deck their graves to-day.

But in the Summerland of Spirit
They live, they live, the Blue and Gray;
And they are reaping what they merit,
For justice gives to each his pay.
And now let every freedom lover,
Rejoice, the North and South are one;
For now the "cruel war is over,"
And the battle fought and won.

A Young Medium.

A few days ago a traveling salesman stopped at my studio, and missing his train in the afternoon he had to stay over for the next one. We had ample time to talk over subjects outside of his business; among other things we drifted onto matters pertaining to Spiritualism. I being interested, asked him if he would have a sitting at my house that evening, and it being agreeable to him, I asked my wife to sit with us at a table for any manifestations that might come. The result was an entire failure. In the meantime my wife had to leave the room. Then my little daughter Thelma came in and asked us what we were doing. I, in a joking way, answered that we were trying to hold the table down. She being entirely ignorant of mediumship or matters pertaining to it, got somewhat interested, and said: "I will come and help you." She suited her action to the words, and put her little hands on the table, and then my wife came back in the room, and my boy and another little girl put their hands on the table. Directly it began to slide about, and we also heard some raps, and it at once became noticeable that it tended toward Thelma. She moved backwards as the table moved towards her, until she was penned in between it and another piece of furniture.

Some of us suggested that she ask the table to move away from her. She did, and it at once obeyed. About that time we all took our hands off the table except Thelma. That seemed to have no effect on the influence. We were surprised to see that the table obeyed her every bidding. It followed her into the next room, across that and back again, she having only one hand on it, at times with one finger only. Quite a number of child-like questions were asked, which the table answered promptly and accurately as far as we know, by the usual way of three moves for yes and one for no. A week afterwards a lady friend was visiting at our house, and we concluded to have another sitting, and the result was similar to the above described.

NATURE'S FORCES.

The Birth of Modern Spiritualism.

It is now asserted by those careless of the truth, that native "Spiritualism is from God."

Now the historic fact is, our grand philosophy is anthropologic, man-made. It is the dower of the genus homo. Look at the story of the dead fact.

A defunct Jew was able to see other people wearing his clothes and others spending his hard-earned money. He got mad, burst the cold cerements of death, came forth, and with all his might struck right and left, pounded the bedstead, doors and tables, till the two frightened Fox sisters, Margaret and Katie, sitting up in bed, began to talk to the noise. They asked questions and the raps answered.

Katy said, "Rap three times as I clap my hands." It did so. She then exclaimed, "Oh, mamma, I can talk to it and it answers questions?" It was decided that three raps should mean yes, and one rap to signify no. Thus understood that rap awakened an astounded world.

Then a new thought was born and let loose on the planet earth. It grew and became the apotheosis of a new philosophy. It did more, it scored the tally mark of a new epoch.

Behold! disembodied man now "came from the dead" to declare, "There is no death!" Man lives on and on, a perennial being of never-ending life.

One of the primal questions the newborn spirit in spirit world is likely to ask, is, "Where is the God of this other world?

The new sojourner, after a brief experience, can return this momentous answer and shout, "There is no God."

Agrippinus Paconius says, "No God or religion govern in spirit life."

Man is responsible to no one but himself. The personal Ego dominates celestial life. Man is the crowning glory of the two worlds, the mundane and the super-mundane. He puts an imaginary plank under his feet and sails like a duck over the sea of universal existence.

In the language of that gifted poet Watts,

"He plants his footsteps on the sea,
And rides upon the storm."

It seems to me it was the versatile writer, Prof. Winchell, who declared that this ball of earth was made for man, the same as that woman was made for man. That idea implies the theory of "Design," as design in nature.

This theory of design and life evolution are opposite and hostile to each other as the poles. It is said design implies purpose and thought. But nature never thinks. The universe is without brain.

Baron Humboldt says "The universe is governed by law," and law is bereft of mentality. It has no more mind than a fossil in lime rock. Man is responsible to himself alone. He must mend his own mistakes, correct his own errors. Forget and forsake the mad theory of atonement.

"Take no thought for to-morrow" is the tramp's passport, the bummer's divine certificate of ease, the loafer's prop and excuse for idleness.

Often when we hear the preacher read, "Take no thought for the morrow," he adds the qualifier "undue." Then we are swift to ask who gave you authority to correct God's word? If God wrote that statement, he said exactly what he wanted to say; and what business has man to correct it?

What is it but shabby impertinence when he does it?

This rational fact stares us in the face—that the universe was not made. It unfolded, it grew. It sprung into form under the force or forces of heat and motion; or matter with motion. Heat is the correlative of motion.

Law and nature comprehend two forces like soul and body or cause or effect.

Here is a fine genetic formula:

The matrix of matter is the nativity of spirit.

Note again a truism, that the Burin of fate has carved in things enduring, thus:

A wrong act stings till retribution heals.

Mortals may sigh, grieve or pray,
Truth's mission is here to stay.

Not unto one has nature given gifts,
But many are receivers of her lifts.

Col. W. S. Wood.

To the Editor:—I thank you for the words of just appreciation which you gave of a remarkable man and a noble character; this at the close of Masonic resolutions, passed at the going out of a brother of the order, Col. Wm. S. Wood, of Shawano, Wis.

A long-time Spiritualist, a pungent writer, a strong and truly patriotic politician, whose trenchant pen did valiant service for the reign of Right in times of electioneering excitement, he lived his fourscore years, leaving behind him a worthy record. He never married, but his kindly spirit was manifested in generous deeds. Many hearts have blessed him for timely help, and all who knew him could not but recognize his life as the manifestation of the pure principles of Spiritualism, whose light illuminated his soul until the last. The following are some lines which the writer sent to this beloved brother-in-law a few years since, the truth of which, in the life he lived, is strikingly apparent as I read them since he left us. They are entitled

A SIMPLE FLOWER.

Go little flower!
Thou simple daisy of the field;
Say, in this hour,
To him, our brother, life must yield
Its fair fruition unto all who seek
To win and hold it; yet not with weak,
Uncertain will, but using all thy might,
Earth, sea and air, and over-arching sky,
The grand eternal law of life and light,
Shall be to thee, the everlasting arms
Beneath thy head, bearing thee up on high,
Above all grov'ling things, all human harms!
Even as the daisy from its dark brown mold
Rises in beauty, turning to the sky
Its pure white bosom, and its heart of gold;
And born of earth, still holds its head on high.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold. Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

THIS BOOK IS FREE

The Mysteries of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism Revealed.

The American College of Sciences of Philadelphia, Pa., has just published a remarkable book on Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism and Magnetic Healing. It is by far the most wonderful and comprehensive treatise of the kind ever printed. The Directors have decided, for a limited time, to give a free copy to each person sincerely interested in these wonderful sciences. It is the result of the combined effort of twenty of the most famous hypnotic specialists in the world. You can now learn the secrets of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism at your own home, free.

Hypnotism strengthens your memory and develops a will of iron. It overcomes bashfulness, revives hope, stimulates ambition and determination to succeed and gives you that self-confidence which enables you to convince people of your real worth. It gives you the key to the inner secrets of mind control. It enables you to absolutely control the thoughts and actions of whomsoever you will. When you understand this grand and mysterious science you can plant suggestions in human minds which will be carried out in a day or even a year hence. You can cure bad habits and diseases in yourself or others. You can cure yourself of insomnia, nervousness and business or domestic worry.

You can instantaneously hypnotize people with a mere glance of the eye, without their knowledge, and powerfully influence them to do as you desire. You can develop, to a marvelous degree, any musical or dramatic talent you may have; you can increase your salary; you can develop your telepathic or clairvoyant power; you can give thrilling and funny hypnotic entertainments; you can win the love and everlasting friendship of those you desire; you can protect yourself against the influence of others; you can become a financial success and be recognized as a power in your community.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

Longley's Beautiful Songs

For Public Meetings and the Home.

VOLUME ONE

Contains the following songs with music:
I'm thinking, dear mother, of you. We miss our boys at home. The land of the bye and bye. The good times yet to be. The land beyond the stars. They are waiting at the portal. When the dear ones gather at home. Resting under the daisies. The grand jubilee. My mother's tender eyes. Dear heart come home. Come in some beautiful dream. Where the roses never fade. In heaven we'll know our own.

SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1902.

Shame! Shame! Shame!

The great Bishop Spalding, of the great Roman Catholic church, having uttered his ipse dixit that for three-fourths of the sin and depravity, the crime and indigence, and poverty of America, the women of the country are responsible, the question may be regarded as settled—with an if—if he is infallible in his judgment.

The statement is merely a limited version of Adam's whining and cowardly excuse: "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree and I did eat."

Said the bishop:

"If the women of the land were more large-minded, more thoughtful, more intelligent, three-fourths of the depravity and sin that curse present day life would disappear."

Perhaps,—and perhaps it might be as justly said, if the men of the land "were more large-minded, more thoughtful, more intelligent, three-fourths of the depravity and sin that curse present day life would disappear."

From whom is the saloon and doggery patronage mostly derived?

Men.

Do the women of our country, as a rule, either by voice or example lead the children, the young men, to become saloon hangers-on and patrons, bums and drunkards?

No—it is the example of men—of fathers, brothers, friends and companions, of the male persuasion.

Statistical observation shows that the saloons are the inciters, fosterers, the breeders of vice and crime, beyond all other agencies of evil influence. Who are responsible for the saloons?

Men—men—not women.

The wise bishop further says:

"Evil in this day has its source in political corruption that taints our whole public life. In municipalities particularly this influence disheartens the most courageous and makes reform seem impossible. It thrives in the saloon, the brothel, and the gambling hell, and perverts the public conscience. If in the home, the school, and the church, where woman's love is potent for good, the sentiments were implanted that corrupt politicians are more dangerous to the nation, the State, and the city than are the convicts of the penitentiaries, what a power for good the women of the land might be."

Who are the corrupt politicians?

Men.

"What a power for good the" men "of the land might be" if they would do as the bishop suggests that the women should do!

If the women could reinforce their moral influence with the ballot, cast by their own hands—"what a power for good they might be."

But with the ballot in the hands of corrupt politicians, saloon bums, gamblers, thieves, unconscionable tramps, and all the long catalogue of male disreputables of all sorts and descriptions, while women are disfranchised—whose is the larger share of just responsibility for the surfeit of sin and crime and depravity "that curse present day life?"

The men—not the women.

And yet "men" of the stamp of mind of Bishop Spalding will echo and re-echo the poor sniveling excuse of old Father Adam, and lay the blame on the women!

Shame! Shame! Shame!

Suffer yet a word more. The bishop's accusation against the women dovetails harmoniously with old bachelor Paul's injunction: "Let your women keep silence in the churches, and if they would know anything, let them ask of their husbands at home," etc.

The women must not teach or talk in public, she must not vote—but if she does not exercise her "influence" she is to blame for three-fourths of the cussedness that fills the penitentiaries with male jail-birds, and curses society with saloons, drunkenness, and all shades of vice and crime.

Oh, the shame of it all!

Paul Leicester Ford on Suffrage.

Paul Leicester Ford, whose tragic death in the prime of his powers has startled the whole country, was a man of progressive ideas in many respects. Among other things, he believed in the ballot for women. In his novel, "The Honorable Peter Stirling," he makes the hero say:

"Broadly speaking, all persons of sound mind are entitled to vote on the men and the laws which are to govern them. Aside from this, every ounce of brain or experience you can add to the ballot makes it more certain. Suppose you say that half the people are too ignorant to vote sensibly. Don't you see that there is an even chance, at least, that they'll vote rightly, and if the wrong half carries the election, it is because more intelligent people have voted wrongly, have not voted, or have not taken the trouble to try and show the people the right way, but have left them to the mercies of he demagogues? If we grant that every man who takes care of himself has some brain, and some experience, his vote is of some value, even if not a high one. Suppose we have an eagle, and a thousand pennies. Are we any better off by tossing away the coppers, because each is worth so little? That is why I have always advocated giving the franchise to women. If we can add ten million voters to an election, we have added just so much knowledge to it, and made it just so much the harder to mislead or buy enough votes to change results."

IMPORTANT CALIFORNIA COURT DECISION

Ordained Ministers of Spiritualism Declared Exempt from Municipal License, by the Terms of the State Constitution.

To the Editor:—Judge Smith has handed down the law in this decision, so that ordained mediums, as ministers of Spiritualism, are exempt from a license, for he states: "The constitution provides for the free exercise and enjoyment of religious professions and worship without discrimination or preference, thus prohibiting the city from imposing any tax or license upon any religious society or upon the exercise of any religious profession."

Since we were not allowed to give any testimony to show that we were ordained as ministers of Spiritualism by the State Association, which is an organized religious body under the laws of the State, Judge Smith holds we had no trial. If the prosecuting attorney desires, he can cause us to have a trial before Judge Smith to prove this. Of course this would be merely a matter of form, because we have the ordination papers besides the constitution and by-laws of the State Association, and Judge Smith has already given the law for such a case.

Our lawyer says that undoubtedly they will dismiss the case, since decision is already given; hence, you can publish the enclosed decision in full if you desire, for I think it will be of interest to your patrons.

Los Angeles, Cal. MRS. MAUD CHESBRO.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles.

Department No. 1.

The People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. Maud Chesbro and G. E. Chesbro, Defendants. } Appeal.

The defendant were convicted in the Police Court of this city upon a complaint filed in said court charging them with "Unlawfully carrying on, practicing and professing to practice the business and art of mediumship, clairvoyance and clairaudience and life reading in said city, and did then and there demand and receive a fee for the exercise and exhibition of their art without having procured a license from said city to do so, contrary to the ordinance of said city," etc.

The section of the ordinance under which the conviction was had is as follows: "For every person who carries on, practices or professes to practice the business or art of astrology, palmistry, chiromancy, life reading, fortune telling, cartomancy, clairvoyance, clairaudience, crystal gazing, hypnotism, mediumship, prophecy, augury, divination, magic or necromancy, and who demands and receives a fee for an exercise or exhibit of his art therein at any place where an admission fee is charged, five dollars per month."

There is no question but that the city under its charter and the police powers conferred by the constitution has a right to license all trades, business and professions. This is the general rule, but to this rule there is an exception, and the exception is found in the Constitution of our State. It is as follows: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious professions and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever be guaranteed in this State * * * but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State." Thus it will be seen that the city is powerless to impose any tax or license upon any religious society or upon the exercise of any religious profession.

It is claimed by defendants that at the time in question, they were exercising the rites and performing the acts in accordance with and as a part of their religious faith and professions, and accordingly defendants sought to show upon the trial that they were what is commonly known as Spiritualists, that Spiritualism is a religion represented by a regularly organized religious society in this State, and what they did, (for which they were called in question in this case) they did in accordance with the rites, ceremonies and practices of such religious society.

The ordinance requires a license of five dollars per month from those who practice mediumship, clairvoyance, clairaudience and life reading.

The case was evidently tried by the court below upon the theory that these terms, "mediumship," &c., have a definite and well understood meaning and that they are outside the exercise of any form of religious rites. None of these terms are defined by our statutes, nor by the ordinance in question. If we refer to the dictionaries to ascertain their meaning, we find the Standard Dictionary defines "medium" as follows: "Anything that acts or serves intermediately, a secondary or proximate agency by or through which a primary agent acts." Second meaning: "Spiritualism, a person believed to be possessed or controlled by the personality of some person who has died so as to speak or act from the intelligence of that person; also one whose organization supplies the psychic force used by spirits in materialization;" and mediumship is thus defined: "The state or condition of being a medium." No doubt the term in the ordinance is used in this Spiritualistic sense. In the same work clairvoyance is defined: "Ability to see or discern objects not within reach of the eye under normal conditions as in a trance, claimed to be possessed by some persons in the mesmeric trance state; second sight; seership, hence intuitive sagacity or perception." Clairaudience: "Ability to perceive sounds not within reach of the ears under normal conditions, alleged especially of persons in the mesmeric state."

It must be apparent from the foregoing definitions that persons doing those things which go to make up the mediumship, clairvoyance, clairaudience and life reading, may be in the legitimate exercise of religious rites and ceremonies, and since the law is powerless to circumscribe or prescribe any form of religious worship, so long as it does not interfere with the peace and good order of society, it follows that it was perfectly legitimate, upon the trial of this cause, to show on the part of the defense (if they could) that what defendants did was in accordance with the rules, tenets and theology of a regularly incorporated religious society of this State. In other words, using the language of Art. 1, Sec. 4, of our Constitution, what defendants did may have been in the "exercise and enjoyment of religious professions and worship;" if so, the municipality is powerless to compel defendants to pay license for so doing. And in any view of the case, the court should have permitted defendants to show that Spiritualism is represented by a religious society; that such society has ministers, and that what they did was in the exercise of the rites and privileges of that church or society. All this the court below refused, and exception was taken by defendants.

The ultimate question in the case was, did the defendants do the acts complained of in the exercise of a religious belief and in accordance with the tenets of a religious society. This question had to be passed on by court or jury, and as the cause was tried by a jury, how could they determine the fact without hearing evidence? Neither the court nor jury could say arbitrarily and without evidence that Spiritualism is not a religious belief and that mediumship is not part of such belief and that clairvoyance and clairaudience is no part of the exercise of such beliefs, hence we hold it was error to exclude the class of evidence referring to supra.

The defendants asked the court to give to the jury instructions numbered from 2 to 5 inclusive, and they were refused. The third instruction, asked by defendants and refused, embodies substantially the law as expressed in the other three, and is as follows: "You are instructed that all religions are equally respected by the law; one is not to be favored at the expense of others, or discriminated against, nor is any distinction to be made between them either in the law, in positions under the law or in the administration of government. The Constitution of this State forbids restraints upon the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, and the exercise and enjoyment of religious profession is not subjected to the censorship of the State or of any public authority. The City of Los Angeles has no right under the law to require a license from any person to perform, profess or exercise religious rites and ceremonies. The ordinance of the city of Los Angeles is to be construed as not including in its provisions the profession or practice of religion. Therefore, if you entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether or not the acts of the defendants testified to were done and performed in the enjoyment and exercise of religious profession and worship, as they believed it, then you should acquit the defendants."

The instruction should have been given and it was error to refuse it.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed and a new trial awarded in this court, and it is so ordered.

(Signed) B. N. SMITH, Judge.

Mind-Reading or Mediumship.

It appears from the Evening Observer of Dunkirk, N. Y., that Henry F. Schmul, who resides there, is making an extensive study of the science of telepathy. Telepathy is a means of communication between two persons at a distance or in other words, is thought transference. Mr. Schmul, in discussing this study, states that there is not a doubt in his mind that telepathy will be one of the great means of communication in the future. He says, when the science is fully mastered, it will entirely surpass as a means of talking with people at a distance, the now famous Marconi's wireless telegraphy.

Mr. Schmul has made several successful experiments in the past few months. One subject which he worked upon related in detail a visit Mr. Schmul had taken to Buffalo a few days previous. To his subject Mr. Schmul suggested the name of a lady whom both he and the subject knew personally. He asked the subject to relate the action of the friend during the day. Although the lady in question resides in St. Paul, Minn., every action that she did was fully told. At the time of sitting the subject stated that the woman in the northwestern city was then writing a letter to her. She told line for line the contents of the missive.

Within the next few days a letter came to the subject from the woman in St. Paul. The contents were identically the same as were stated several nights previous. Mr. Schmul has the letter and also the letter that the subject dictated to him.

As a further test the subject was told to put her mind a length of time in the future. She wished to know whether she would get a sum of money which was due her from a certain firm and also to know whether she would be successful in securing a civil service position for which she had taken an examination and had passed the highest.

While her mind was centered directly upon these two questions, Mr. Schmul suddenly asked whether she would receive the money and position. She stated that the position would be given to another and named the successful applicant; but the money she would receive in full. Both turned out as she had predicted.

Mr. Schmul is something more than a mind-reader; he is undoubtedly a medium.

A Haunted Man.

We frequently record the stories of haunted houses, but this is the story of a haunted man, as related in the Chicago American of a late date:

It is the story of Dr. Emmett Enos, who recently resigned as chief of staff of the Kankakee Insane Hospital. Now he himself is hopelessly insane—violently so—at his home in the little town of Hersher.

It is not a pretty story—not even a thrilling one.

It is merely the recital of a man's bitter battle with relentless fate—as terrible a fight as any man has ever fought.

It is the story of how for months a ghost walked in his footsteps. All through the day, bright with the glory of the great sun; all through the night with the tender beauty of the stars, this man was followed by a ghost—that awful specter—insanity. It never left him.

His eyes could not turn from its horrible, mocking face. He could not cry out for mercy; he could not pray for pity, for every day, yes, every hour, the awful thing came nearer—nearer—nearer.

Lear, on the heath in the storm, is not a more pitiful picture. Saul, as he looked in his beloved harpist's face trying to believe him faithful, is not a more tragic one. To know that you are going insane, to feel it creeping, creeping toward you, to know your later days are to be spent in a living death that is worse—far worse than death itself. Oh, it is horrible, horrible!

It was three months ago that Dr. Enos first realized that he was a doomed man. For years he had studied the insane; for years he had tended and cared for those whose minds had failed. He was familiar with the symptoms of approaching madness. When they developed in himself he recognized them and knew the worst.

In order that he should not be deceived he took the utmost precautions.

Dr. Podstata, who became temporary chief of the institution upon Dr. Enos' resignation, and Dr. William Lempke, of Chicago, visited the stricken man at his home last February. They made a careful examination of him there. Their verdict was unanimous.

His long experience had not deceived him. His conclusions were correct. The terrible blight of insanity was upon him.

It might not come for many months, perhaps. It might not come for years; but always, always, step by step, slow or fast, it was coming toward him.

With a courage almost sublime, a courage that makes the hero, who gains immortal fame upon the battlefield and loses only life, Dr. Enos faced his fate. The physicians who attended him kept his secret. He himself said nothing. He went his daily rounds, he did his duty as he saw it, he looked out upon the world with cheerful face and brave eyes and did not falter. He uttered no complaining word. No one was burdened with his sorrow. He trod the winepress alone.

Every preparation was made for the care of his wife and children when what was to come should come. He arranged all his affairs and put his property all in shape so that those whom he loved should know no want.

Then he waited.

The end came a few days ago. With Dr. Van Doren he was called in consultation over a sick child. The baby died—died in convulsions—but through no fault of Dr. Enos.

The course he advised was the proper one to take. No medical skill could have saved her.

Nevertheless he brooded over the death of the little one, brooded over it constantly, and then his mind under the strain began to fail. He showed symptoms of unsoundness and was erratic. Tuesday night he gave unmistakable signs of mental aberration. He took a wild drive into the country about midnight. On his return he said he had called to see Ole T. Olsen, a rich farmer of the district.

"Mr. Olsen has swallowed a gold brick; he must have an operation," he declared.

From that time Dr. Enos has been violently insane. Life is a blank to him. He sees no one, knows no one. The children that are his flesh and bone are strangers to him; the wife whom he loved cannot quiet him; he looks upon the mother who bore him without recognition.

Again the doctors have examined him and have given no hope for his recovery. They describe his case as hopeless. In the near future he will, it is thought, be removed to the hospital for the insane over which he so long presided.

For the present three men watch over him night and day, while he raves and cries and laughs and looks upon the world with strange, unseeing eyes.

This is a pitiful story, but in the annals of other hospitals for the insane are recorded many similar occurrences, though perhaps not having fallen upon one so prominently connected and so scientific an expert upon insanity. It is not a very unusual thing in some asylums for the attendants to become infected or obsessed, whichever term may be properly applied. This will be of especial interest to the students of the occult, or auto-suggestion, or obsession.

From this noted victim of insanity and his gradual mental decline, under the haunt that he claimed attended him all the time of approaching insanity, there is a good foundation for an instructive discourse from some of our great spiritual philosophers, our expert theorists in hypnotism or self-psychology.

Nerve by nerve gave way as step by step the Doctor marked the approach of this grim spectre. Wave by wave came the suggestion that he would some day be insane. Day after day and night after night did the long, bony finger of this silent power thump away at the consciousness of this learned and careful professor as he watched and studied the individual cases of insanity that were brought into that great institution, no two of which were alike in the main and yet many similar in general features, and he studied, and held post-mortems, and talked and read upon the one subject, and as the awful thing or condition was constantly before him, his tired and sensitive brain became a victim and a hopeless case.

Uplifting the Race.

Spiritualists are interested in whatever tends to uplift the race. The whole animus of Spiritualism, in all its phases and departments, the tendency of its phenomena, its philosophy, its ethics—its religion, if you will—is to better the status of man individually, socially, morally, spiritually; and it applies to the life that is, on earth, and the life hereafter.

This being the case, very many will be interested in a statement by "R. A. W." in the Chicago Journal, to the effect that Francis Galton, a London scientist, with D. C. L., D. Sc., and F. R. S. to his name, declares that it is possible to improve the human breed.

A Utopia, in which all women will be beautiful and all men perfect specimens of manhood, is the goal to which the eminent Englishman's researches have led him. Apart from physical qualities he believes that citizens of civic virtue may be produced by a process of natural selection.

The subject is one that occupied him for years and forms a conclusion to two of his books: "Hereditary Genius" and "Natural Inheritance."

Mr. Galton is not a radical who believes that environment is the cause of social differences. He is a profound believer in the doctrine that what is must be right. The transmission of hereditary traits is the be-all and end-all of progress.

As a remedy for crime he proposes simply to let the criminal classes die out. Speaking of the people at the lowest step of the social scale, he says:

"Many who are familiar with the habits of these people do not hesitate to say that it would be an economy and a great benefit to the country if all habitual criminals were resolutely segregated under merciful surveillance and peremptorily denied opportunities for producing offspring. It would abolish a source of suffering and misery to a future generation and would cause no unwarrantable hardship to this."

Whether this would bring the consummation devoutly to be wished of a race free from habitual criminals is at least doubtful in the light of history. But history is the one subject not touched on in the article. No mention is made of the failure of sumptuary laws in all stages of the world's advancement.

Like Malthus, who said that population increased faster than the means of subsistence, Mr. Galton has uttered a truism in stating that the human breed, or, preferably, the human race, is capable of improvement. Malthus inferred that this natural law was the cause of poverty. Mr. Galton says that depravity is also referable to nature. Actual social conditions in both cases were ignored.

As an attempt to employ a scientific method to social conditions Mr. Galton's essay is a curiosity. A table is established that runs from mediocrity of talent up to genius and down to crime.

In 10,000 persons 35 are assumed to have the highest desirable qualities and 35 to be possessed of the lowest characteristics. There are four classes intermediate. Comparisons are then made of the normal classes with the following:

A. Criminals, semi-criminals and loafers.

B. Poor persons who subsist on casual earnings, many of whom are inevitably poor from shiftlessness, idleness or drink.

C. Hard-working people, with a bad character for improvidence and shiftlessness.

D. People regularly earning 21 shillings a week, none of whom are very poor.

E. Those with regular standard earnings of 22 to 30 shillings a week. This is the largest class of any and represents the people of mediocre qualities.

F. The better-paid artisans and foremen.

G. Shopkeepers, small employers, clerks, and subordinate professional men, who as a rule are hard-working, energetic and sober.

H. All above G.

The assumption is made that the members of each class are there because they are not fitted to emerge into one of the higher ghades.

How to obtain human perfection is not to be found in the leveling of the social conditions which begin in poverty and sweep on to affluence. Such a simple proposition might do for dreamers, but to a socialist of the Lombroso type, such as Mr. Galton evidently is, improvement must come in some other way. For instance:

"The brains of the nation lie in the higher of our classes. If such people as would be classed W or X could be distinguishable as children and procurable by money it would be a cheap bargain for the nation to buy them at the rate of many hundreds or some thousands of pounds per head."

Under this style of argument Edison as a baby, transplanted to England, would still have developed into an electrician, Paderewski and Wagner as mewling emigrants would have dominated the musical world from, say, Chicago; Huxley himself, who attributed his eminence to the fact that Toronto University rejected his application for a professorship, would have enlightened the world from Canada.

The influence of environment, necessity of a particular clientele, and peculiarly gifted instructors have been exaggerated. A man would improve just the same if the goal were placed properly before him.

Later on Mr. Galton says that the possibility of improving the race of a nation depends on the power of increasing the productivity of its best stock, rather than repressing the productivity of the worst, thus destroying the popular idea as to the offspring of geniuses. For this purpose he would grant diplomas to select classes of young men and women to encourage their intermarriage. The befriendment of great landowners in such cases is declared to have produced a class of workers on their estates markedly superior to those in similar positions elsewhere. "It might well become a point of honor," adds the English savant, "for noble families to gather fine specimens of humanity around them, as it is to procure and maintain fine breeds of cattle, and so forth, which are costly, but repay in satisfaction."

In all kindness it might be pointed out that fine breeds of cattle require the best food, and the greatest care. They must not be overworked nor unduly exposed if they are to remain as nature intended they should.

Nature has also given the material to mankind, but while men of Mr. Galton's intellectual ability blind themselves to the lessons of the past as well as to every-day experience, seeking for fanciful theories of crime and physical or intellectual degeneracy, the desired Utopia will always exist as a filmy vision.

The application of science to humanity is not so much a question of crime as of food, shelter, light, air, hygiene, and education.

This last paragraph embodies a truth that deserves thoughtful attention. Education, however, should not be taken entirely in a pedagogical sense, as pertaining exclusively to the ordinary routine of the school and college; but should extend into the higher and finer domains of mans' spiritual nature.

Toward this culmination in spirituality all genuine uplifting and educational influences must and do inevitably tend; in this they find their true fulfillment.

The Golden Rule.

The Golden Rule is world-wide and is variously voiced as follows:

Do as you would be done by.—Persian.

Do not that to a neighbor which you would take ill from him.—Grecian.

What you would not wish done to yourself do not unto others.—Chinese.

One should seek for others the happiness one desires for oneself.—Buddhist.

He sought for others the good he desired for himself. Let him pass on.—Egyptian.

All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.—Christian.

Let none of you treat his brother in a way he himself would dislike to be treated.—Mohammedan.

The true rule in business is to guard and do by the things of others as they do by their own.—Hindoo.

The law imprinted on the hearts of all men is to love the members of society as themselves.—Roman.

Whatsoever you do not wish your neighbor to do to you do not unto him. This is the whole law. The rest is a mere exposition of it.—Jewish.

New Mexico and Woman Suffrage.

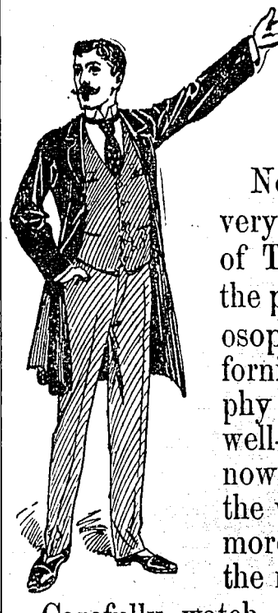
Says the Raton Range: "Equal suffrage is sure to come to New Mexico and to her sister states and territories; it is the inevitable sequence of progress and enlightenment. The handwriting is already on the wall and is seen and understood by intelligent men everywhere. We can understand the aversion of the wardheeler and political trickster to such an order of things but why an honest respectable man should object to being voted for by a decent woman is beyond one's comprehension."

Woman's Work for Humanity.

There are over one hundred organizations of women in this country of national scope, with an enrollment of ver 2,000,000. When we find 2,000,000 women working for the good of humanity with no voice whatever in the government we realize what a force for good our government is depriving itself of and wonder how men who are desirous of better and purer conditions in governmental affairs will consent to do without the direct aid of these women.

Are Women Represented by Men?

The Committee on Probate and Chancery of the Massachusetts Legislature has reported against the bill granting mothers equal guardianship of their children with the fathers. This self-evidently-just measure was endorsed by the Massachusetts W. S. A., the State Federation of Women's Clubs, the State W. C. T. U., the Woman's Relief Corps, and more than a hundred other societies, aggregating 34,000 women. Does anyone suppose for one moment that this committee would have reported against this bill if all these women asking for it had a vote?



Trust for the "Repose of the Soul."

The supreme court of Alabama, in the case of Festerazzi vs. Church, 18 Southern Reporter, 394, has held that a bequest, to a church, to be used for solemn masses for the repose of the soul, is invalid, not being a direct bequest to the church for its general uses, nor creating a valid charitable use, nor creating a valid private trust, for the want of a living beneficiary. This decision is all right, and knocks out a superstition that has cursed the world for centuries.

BULLETIN

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

An Important Announcement

Next week will appear two very able articles on the subject of Theosophy: One illustrating the principle absurdities of Theosophy, by R. A. Dague, a Californian, and the other, "Theosophy versus Spiritualism," by the well-known Dr. J. M. Peebles, now on his fourth trip around the world. These articles are of more than ordinary interest to the readers of this paper.

Carefully watch these announcements from week to week for important articles.

THE RELIGION OF MAN

To the Editor:—Your new premium book, Religion of Man and the Ethics of Science, will prove a very valuable addition to the library so generously furnished the patrons of The Progressive Thinker. It is splendidly written and contains many facts of interest to the general reader, facts which all should know, and is an eye-opener to the devotee of the old superstitions. The book alone is well worth the price of the premium and paper combined.

WILL C. HODGE.

He Is Appreciative.

To the Editor:—Enclosed find P. O. order for two dollars. Will you kindly send me The Progressive Thinker for one year, and in accordance with your ad. a copy each of "Art Magic," and "Ghost Land." I cannot ask this without expressing my appreciation of a movement which places such valuable books in reach of those who otherwise could not get them. I am deeply grateful to those who have done it. Would that I could send twenty instead of two dollars, or many times more, to help you keep these books out still longer, that more might have the benefit of them, who like myself, are wading through the varied miseries that attend the spiritual awakening.

ELMO O. NELSON.

San Francisco, Cal.

PHENOMENAL.

Transactions of the Aber Intellectual Circle, Spring Hill, Kan.

I will recite that which settles for all time, that man is an integral part of the universe—the most important factor in it, and that he lives for all time. He is essentially a spiritual being.

I lived from the year 1847 to 1851 at Kygesville, Ohio. It was in 1849 or 1850, that David Tate lived east of me on the same block. He was a Methodist class-leader. Mr. Upchurch, the Methodist preacher, had concluded to expend his forces there. The meeting-house was across the lot near my house. I was an agnostic then. The noise on the third night was hideous—a deafening craze; it kept the roar up till 11 o'clock. It invaded my rights; it was like the roar of wild beasts. I sought redress.

On the next morning I met Tate in front of his house and said to him: "You think that noise is religion; the greater the roar and uproar, the better the religion. Away with such religion. It should be relegated to the moles and bats. For a cent, I would go to your meeting and would allay its noise."

He was sarcastic in his reply. He said I was a pretty man to talk as I did. It was the spirit of God that worked on the people that created all the noise. I had better try breaking up the wind. It was the only way to get me to go to church anyhow. He laughed heartily when I left. He was so pungent and imperious on that day, that it took my labor from my own affairs to that of the church.

I saw Asa and Joseph Bradbury, and they both agreed that they would be at church early. We were there by appointment, and took the first seat near the pulpit. The house was crowded when Mr. Upchurch began his preaching. He stormed and raved at times he was mellow and soft; eloquent and cautious. He gave out a hymn and came down the steps of the pulpit to where we were seated, and then we moved to the altar. I looked on the audience and saw but one start—a girl of fourteen. I said to her mentally and emphatically, "You stop," and she suddenly stopped. There was no enthusiasm in the congregational singing. The church was as a funeral on that night. On the night before, all was noise and confusion!

In the fall of 1889, Mr. Aber was still in my employ. He gave a seance each night. Some were better than others. One night the seance was brilliant in display. The spirits talked stronger than usual, and I was called up the second time when there appeared a small man in the block. He said in the hearing of all the circle, "I am Upchurch, the man whose revival you about broke up at Kygesville, Ohio."

I replied: "By thunder, Mr. Upchurch, I broke it up entirely." He then passed out of sight. I do not know when before I had thought of that revival incident, and of late when I have mentioned it, it was in connection with Rev. Green; but after the announcement of Mr. Upchurch that it was his revival, I accept it as his, and as I thought more closely of the matter, it became clearer in my mind. Both ministers were on that circuit while I lived at Kygesville. Forty years was a long time to remember that incident with the hurly-burly of making a living in this world. I remembered well that I broke up a revival in that town by the interposition of the law stronger applied than Mr. Upchurch could.

An elucidation of a law that he was applying: The priests of every nation make use of the same law. The howling dervishes of Mohammedan faith, the worshipers of Africa and of Christian nations resort to the same law. They declare it is the spirit of God in answer to prayer. They do not define and prove their god, but employ faith and this hypnotic law to relegate mankind to a standstill, to stop investigation.

In the fall of 1888, there came a gentleman and a woman, and a vigorous churchman. He came with Mr. Simpson, in time to introduce him. He was a commercial traveler. I sat him near the apex of the circle. I was called the second time. When I got near the place—the light was good—there came Jesus of Narazeth. I was astonished. I turned and looked at the high churchman. His gaze was fixed on him. At last he spoke: "Our Savior." I retorted, "Each man is his own savior." To this Jesus assented by bowing his head. Then came his mother and Mary Magdalene. Jesus and his mother were Greeks, and Mary Magdalene had the complexion of a Jew. They came in the same order in different seances.

Then came a lady after Jesus the first time. She was well dressed and made herself up to be examined. I made the examination. I asked her if she belonged to Europe, Asia or Africa; of the distant or near races, but she did not belong to any of them. Brother Nixon then observed that she belonged to the Aztec race, to which she replied affirmatively. I then asked her to define her station in life, but she would not, and pointed to my library. It contains Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico. I did not at once examine it; I was too busy. She materialized again before I had time to examine Prescott as to who she was and to what station in life she belonged. She again pointed to the library. On Saturday evening she materialized, and I promised her I would look up the matter at once. The next day I found and identified her. When she next materialized, I inquired if she was not Malinche, as known by the Aztecs, or Mariana, as known by the Spaniards. She answered affirmatively. (See Prescott's Conquest of Mexico Vol. I. p. 208). She remained with us as long as our interest in her continued, but as she had advanced to a higher sphere she left us.

Cortez materialized very plainly. His dress was white while his hair and beard were very black.

Our seances were given for development. Step by step, they were gradually uplifting. Often in the early stages, attempts by the spirits would be made to write until finally they would succeed.

Sam Smidt, Mr. Aber's control, announced in February, 1889, that writing should be done that would go around the world because of its intrinsic merit. Little did we think that it would occur. We were so interested that we wrote out an exegesis of the New Testament. We showed its palpable contradictions and the fallacy of its doctrine. This was read in London, precisely as Sam (a spirit) had foretold. We continued to hold materializing seances, increasing in merit and importance.

One evening in 1889, Elizabeth, Queen of England, materialized. It was for instruction. Every feature was plainly visible. Her articulation was clear and her actions noble and graceful. The next one who appeared was Mary, Queen of Scots. She came to England, was captured and beheaded, but she had the French education which survives the ravages of time. Hence, the English and French do not infract Nature's law. When placed in juxtaposition, they are not antagonistic. They lived in their ways—one English, the other French in their manners. Elizabeth was more like Cato; Mary was more like Chesterfield, who courtesied her adieu most gracefully.

John Wesley came that night in full canonicals. His hair extended to his shoulders and parted in the middle. He preached in pantomime. He was fervid, and his small hand was often raised in graceful gesticulation. On the next day I went to town and told of his pantomime preaching. I spoke of his small hand. A Methodist said that some author had spoken of Wesley's small hands.

On the same evening or the one next to it, the spirit students of Oxford showed the nightcaps, coming to a point above the head. Some were black and graded to white. They were of all colors that genius or fancy could devise.

At one seance a lady visitor being present, I gave her a seat to my right. Brother Nixon was called on to interview his departed friends. His father would appear in all phases, from youth to old age while he stood before the aperture; after which a form appeared at the aperture. The lady visitor caught the image of her father and at once began to interrogate him. Said she: "Now, Pap, is it right to show yourself?"

"Yes, my child, it is right."

"Is it right, though," she insisted.

"Yes, my child, it is right. Anything done by the laws of nature is right."

Here we see the effect of early education, or rather miseducation.

The materialized form of this lady's father shocked her feelings. She thought he ought to be in his grave awaiting his resurrection, and he might not find his way back into his resting-place, and so miss his chance.

Another instance of this kind is that of the mysterious disappearance of a valuable portrait that would identify some whose identity was not desirable in the mind of one individual present. This shows a feeling antagonistic to spiritual development. Here again is the effect of priestly influence, warping and distorting the mind that will require years of painful struggle to overcome.

James B. Somers, of the Spring Hill New Era, came twice to our seances. It was soon after Mr. Aber came. His first visit was in the afternoon. At this seance he recognized no one. The second time at night (I stood up with the gentleman), he first saw and recognized Dr. Danner; then he saw and recognized Dr. Coons; the next he saw and recognized Old Man Hare. All had been residents of our town. They had not been dead long. Dr. Coons gave a wave of his hand that denoted him, and Dr. Danner gave his head a peculiar nod in greeting, and Old Man Hare had such a fondness for his whiskers that was quite noticeable. We could have recognized these men without their peculiarities; but they make the case stronger.

I mention this last case as a sample of three-fourths of those that come here and recognize their friends. Mr. Somers went away and did not mention in his paper his visits to the seances; but it was not long before I heard that he had been to Pratt's, but had not seen anything. As soon as I heard of it I went to his office and bearded him in his den. I said to him: "Jim Somers, you lied as to what you saw at my house. Did you say that you saw Drs. Coon and Danner, and Old Man Hare?"

"Well, I thought I saw them."

"You said in my presence that you saw them. There was no 'may-be' about it. Now, was not that so?"

"Yes," he said.

Not long after that time I was in Bailey's drug store. I heard a young man say that he had been to Pratt's and he saw nothing.

"You did not, eh? You saw Overton, of Bonita, at the cabinet window, and spoke to him, too. Now, did you not?"

A feeble and reluctant "yes" came.

There came up one morning with Mr. Simpson a relative of the family. I think there were fully twenty persons in the seance. The light was good. Suddenly this gentleman was entranced, and at once informed me of an accident that befell me when I was but four years old. My father went out on a side hill and cut down a large grape vine that was attached to a large leaning tree, for a swing by mortising a hole in a board and boring a hole through the grape and beneath the board. Often the nurse girl would go out to swing. She put me astride, and gave me a push, and when I had swung fifteen feet I fell because the seat had given way. I was not so badly hurt, but I was badly scared. I remember it distinctly to-day.

The events and incidents here related are given to show the circumstances and conditions attending the earlier experiences preparatory in the work of "Rending the Vail"—a work of infinite value and benefit to mankind.

BOOK REVIEW.

Reminiscences of Gov. R. J. Walker; with the True Story of the Rescue of Kansas from Slavery. By Geo. W. Brown, M. D. Printed and published by the author, Rockford, Ill. Price $1.

The subject matter of this book vividly recalls the stirring times of the old "irrepressible conflict" between freedom and slavery, which finally resulted in the Rebellion and the decree of Emancipation which blotted the institution of slavery from our land. To one who took a deep interest at the time, in that conflict, the reading of this account brings the feeling of being once more in "the hot of the fight," with his blood boiling anew over the fray.

Dr. Brown's account will be found especially valuable as a succinct, careful and reliable history of the early and exciting period of the territorial affairs of Kansas, including its admission as a free state in our Union.

While valuable to all, in a general sense, as a faithful and accurate history, this book will prove exceptionally interesting to all Kansans, not only to those who passed through and took part in the affairs of those times that truly "tried men's souls," but also those who have come later upon the scenes and who now enjoy the ripe rich fruits of the brave efforts of the old pioneers of Kansas freedom.

The book is neatly and substantially bound in cloth, and is embellished with several portraits of eminent actors in the stirring affairs of those days. The author should be encouraged with a large sale for his work.

Address Geo. W. Brown, M. D., Rockford, Ill. The price, postpaid, is $1.00.

Price 35 cents each, or $1.00 for the three.

"Social Upbuilding, Including Co-operative Systems and the happiness and Ennoblement of Humanity." By E. D. Babbitt, LL. D., M. D. This comprises the last part of Human Culture and Cure. Paper cover, 15 cents. For sale at this office.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS

By J. Clegg Wright, at Masonic Temple, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President and Friends:—We have met again to enter into those higher relationships which bring the thought and inspiration that all the contents of this life and experience are but stepping stones toward an entrance into a greater field of nature that we sometimes call the spirit world. Nature this morning puts on her best attire; the green meadow begins to gleam in the happy sunshine of spring, the birds come forth from their winter hiding-places, and the joyous notes of happiness are heard. All living things seem to feel that nature is awakening, that the natural Christ is coming to embody his logos in all phenomena.

From the very beginning of human teaching, man has felt something beyond the region of sense consciousness; something touched him and his consciousness that seemed to spring out of another domain of life. Silent you are this morning, but you are thinking, and that great brain world of the thinker, great mystery as it is, was the birthplace of all religious sentiments and emotions, and these sentiments and emotions twine themselves around the manifestations of nature. Religion in all its forms was inspired by nature; the great power, the unthinkable power and the majesty of nature always touch man. However low his reason, however imperfect his judgment and powerful his propensities, in whatever circumstances of life, he felt this power of nature. When he had no words to express the emotions of his imagination, he invented signs and instituted rites for the expression of these interior states of his mind, and they became the symbols of his worship.

The priest was the first monarch that ever controlled the thought and habit of man; he was a greater monarch than ever sat on a throne; he is so to-day. Probably the Pope of Rome is about the best representative of the holiness of the priesthood we have in the world. He is the greatest monarch, because he rules the consciences of so large a number of people. He cultivates the moral adhesiveness of a large part of Christendom. What the Pope thinks is right, the people following his kingship will think the same and bow down to the same standard of moral adhesiveness. The hold that emotion has on the conscience is very old, and with it have come down the ages many beautiful, venerable usages. Great officers of state, men who were entrusted with the political conscience of the people in an age when the moral freedom of the intellect was unknown, were instituted into their offices by and through certain sacrifices and certain ceremonies which in themselves were symbolical. Many of them were derived from the priest as a recognition of his power, the civil representative being dependent on the ecclesiastical power. These usages extended far back, long before what is called Christianity, but in the very form of worship these monarchical moral restraints were held over the consciences of men.

We are very soon to have a real king made, over on the other side of the water, but he is not properly made a king yet. Now he is a king on the hereditary plane alone; he is a king now because his mother was a queen, and the virtue of his kingship is by descent, but very soon he will be crowned and then he will be king sole, a king in every sense of the term, for after he is crowned he will have a virtue he does not now possess; it is a spiritual virtue that he will receive.

The Archbishop of Canterbury is an extraordinary man, not a mere man, but because he is Archbishop of Canterbury and having been anointed by a previous Archbishop or Bishop he is in the line of apostolical succession, consequently there is a virtue in the Archbishop that there is not in you at all. You are not at all, in the same sense, gifted with this virtue. You might pour oil onto the head of Edward but it would not make any difference, it would only be like a common barber doing the job, but the Archbishop of Canterbury has a virtue derived from apostolical succession and he will be, on that great occasion, the representative of Almighty God. He will represent the power that made this flower, and that made you, and that made the universe, and then, after his anointing, Edward becomes a king.

Now, what does that anointing stand for? Why are they going to put a few drops of oil on King Edward's head? Not that his hair is as stiff as mine, not to make it lie down. He parts his hair wider down the middle than I do, but it does not follow that he has much care about his hair. They are going to put the oil on his head. In the olden times they greased the king all over, from head to feet, but now they will not do that with this king. They will put oil on his head because there was once a time when man had no language by which he could express the transference of divine authority, and that oil represents life, power, authority—the delegated authority of the Infinite—and the oil stands for divine authority, life, generation, heredity, the divinity of reproduction, the power to rule, authority as represented in Almighty God. This becomes a very solemn act; the King of England will sit on his throne a crowned king, and he will stand for God. He is not king only, but he is God, and what he does is done by God. Now, then, what a responsibility is placed on this man, this king! He must do right. If he fails to act right he becomes subject to impeachment both by civil and ecclesiastical authority.

He must do right; he must represent the highest ideal of justice, hence he is poetically in every court from the highest in the land to the simple justice's court. All actions are pursued in his name, and when there is an oath taken in his court God stands as judge, for this virtue comes to the justices in the same manner; God is in the courts of justice and God is holding the consciences of the witnesses. This is ideal divine government on earth. Of course, no government could be thought about that to man would be as good, as wise and perfect as God's government. If man could be governed by God absolutely, infinite wisdom governing him and making the statutes, there would be need for neither Democrats nor Republicans; we would have perfect government; perfect law, perfect justice.

I want to give you another thought, because you are not living in England. Some of your forefathers a while ago "kicked over the traces," and said, "We will be free," and established a government in this country, not very different from the one in the old country because it retained a part of this representative divine character in the President. You institute your President here in Washington—you make him President. The votes of a part of the people make him president. A few hundreds sometimes will decide it, so there may be six hundred or there may be six million, three hundred people in favor of making him king, and there may be six millions against him being king. So you have nearly half the people against his kingship. But a majority makes him king by selection and then you make him swear that he will administer the constitution according to its letter and spirit, but you do not swear him by the power of the people. You swear him by Almighty God, because you believe that he will obey God in preference, or the influence of God on his conscience will be greater than the influence of the people on his conscience. You thus introduce into the principle of democracy monarchy; at the back of your constitution stands God, and you swear by God. Now I am not objecting to all this, but I want you to see how we stand related in our moral consciousness to God, to this mighty power, the greatest in nature. Our love of humanity is not equal to the mastery of divinity over the consciousness and the conscience of man.

I sometimes wonder whether spiritual organizations will ever become permanent until there is more decided attention paid to the development of the moral consciousness. We fail, I think, in impressing powerfully on the people that it is the duty of Spiritualists to maintain the cause they represent in their thoughts; that if there be a virtue in spiritual communion that will add to the happiness of the human race it is the first moral duty of every man to seek to extend the knowledge of that truth to mankind. With this moral adhesiveness and the virtue of our facts the cause should be cultivated in the young and should be maintained by the old with a great rigidness of moral stamina and we ought to adhere to and speak conscientiously that which we think. After having thought with great maturity, not hurriedly, we should then dare to make our thought wisely known, cautiously known, courteously known to the people of the community in which we live. The highest religion that man can ever make or unfold is that religion which will teach him the greatest devotion to truth.

SOME COMMENTS

On Prof. Lockwood's Magnificent Essay.

In No. 652 of The Progressive Thinker, Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood has a richly extended scientific essay that almost rises superior to science itself. The definition he gives of science will be new even to some scientists. The logical explanations are demanded to be known.

The essay says "religious zeal and faith unfit a man to be a student of science, for the reason that with belief and faith established a mind is disqualified to investigate those facts which have a tendency to dethrone his faith." The Professor is speaking of the supernatural kind, and of this the comment is only too true. The essay makes no allusion to a natural religion and a natural faith. In the next essay perhaps he will treat of these, since a man with no faith of any kind would be a monster. A man without faith beyond the indicaregularity, beauty, harmony, and perregularity, beauty, harmony, and perfectness would be a still greater monster. A man without faith could not be a scientist. Faith makes the glorious man more glorious.

The evidence and pure logic of the essay make clear the fact that every atom in nature has life, for dead atoms could not be attracted together. Also makes it clear that where there is life there is mind; thus presenting nature in a position to need neither an outside nor an inside God; presenting her at last free and independent, her own guide and master.

With the underbrush so finely removed the field is now ready for glorious work.

Prof. Lockwood's own logic makes it clear that there is an Infinite Intelligence of Nature. He distinctly says there is nothing outside of nature, and he would certainly admit that only like can produce like; that the human mind could not have come from no mind; and that it was the universal infinite mind of nature that produced the comparatively very small mind of man. With this understanding universal throughout mankind, Christianity would jump from the churches to Spiritualism in a twinkling.

Samuel Watson, of Tennessee, went back into the Methodist Episcopal church because he found Spiritualism so limited of mind; so cold and barren; containing nothing of mind beyond that of poor, frail, weak humanity; the humanity of both worlds, and that only.

Other Spiritualists have told me they were not as happy since coming into Spiritualism, shorn of a God, as they were in the church where they had a God. There is reason and good reason for it. Spiritualism took away their great general universal mind and left only human units, fragments, of it.

All this work of Spiritualism was natural. The old structure had to be razed before the new one could be reared. The church felt and sensed that there was something higher and beyond man. It was right. It only made the mistake of rightly locating that something. In the absence of scientific knowledge the mistake is easily pardonable. Science has marched on with giant strides till no wit discovers the true location and true nature of that something which the church has all along possessed, vaguely though it was.

A Spiritualist college that would teach nature devoid of infinite and universal intelligence would not long endure. It would crumble from lack of cohesion. If Prof. Lockwood doesn't see this now he has but to cast his glance along on his present scientific lines a few inches farther and he will see it. Every man is indebted to every other man. Every scientist uses every other scientist. We rise or fall together. The world of knowledge is so great that human minds must be mutually dependent. The discovery of each is the property of all, in the interest of civilization and world enlightenment. Prof. Lockwood gets enlightenment from the labor of others, as well as his own. I do. We all do. It is fraternal. It is charming.

Prof. Lockwood says, "Spiritualism contains a system of synthetic ethics transcending in beauty and eloquence of thought the progressive possibilities of the human soul in the realm of spirit life, far beyond that voiced in any religion or outlined by mortal pen." All of which is beautifully true. While it is so, it still is hemmed in and hedged about by the limitations of man's very smallness, by the comparative insignificant smallness of the archangel mind. It is starved from food from the parent mind of nature. Of course this view is not perceived by the eye of the iconoclast as long as it is so busily engaged with the work of clearing away the underbrush and the weakened timbers of ancient edifices. The human vision is too limited in its range to see every thing in one year or two years. This is wisdom, for when there shall be nothing more to learn, death to happiness will have come in and existence will be a blank.

Prof. Lockwood's essay deals with Infinite Intelligence but only as the synonym of the Christian God. The essay nowhere discloses an understanding of an Infinite Intelligence of nature. It must be that the Professor believes in such an Intelligence, and it seemed a good place to introduce it. While tearing away the old, the new, in juxtaposition with the old, would have helped so much in clearness and meaning, lucidness and comprehension. It would have increased the honors of science and would have relieved the Christian God of some of its untoward features. It would thus far have decreased the gulf between the past and present, thus adding beauty to the truth of the continuity of life and the oneness of Nature.

A number of years ago a spirit said: "The harmonies of nature's mind and the harmonies of the human mind unite to form one grand melody of the spheres, which man should yet understand and appreciate." This statement would now seem on the threshold of realization. Where is there music like sacred music? Nature herself is not more enduring. It is ever fresh, ever new, and ever demanding to be repeated. It adds to permanent growth and lasting harmony. Surely an element of such character cannot be based on a falsehood. It is as easy for a radical to grasp too much as for a conservative not to grasp enough. A natural radical inherits a combative encephalon, and when he knows this he will guard against its uncontrolled freedom.

In establishing educational institutions the radical should not be discouraged, and the conservative, who often furnishes over three-fourths of the money, should be encouraged, to every extent consistent with every truth that is on his side.

Alluding again to the subject of faith, it is refreshing to see the faith displayed by the ever persistent Brother Francis when he flung to the breeze the motto, "Science, supplemented by an exalted morality, the Bible of the future." It was not then so clearly demonstrable as now, yet his sense perception grasped it, and through all the storms that have raged about his ears he has never furled that beautiful and educational banner. He is living to see his wisdom realized by the great world at large.

The scientists are doing a mighty work for progress. All hail to the genius and integrity of the scientist! Overmuch praise for him is impossible. May he continue his arduous and delightful research until the human soul shall lack nothing for its well-rounded and complete satisfaction. May science, augmented by Spiritualism, continue to increase and grow till not a foot of earth shall fail to know of its glad freshness.

MISSIONARY MEETINGS

At the American School of Osteopathy, Kirksville, Mo.

This is the original school where osteopathy is taught; and its founder, Dr. A. T. Still, is yet its active president. He is a plain outspoken man who loves truth above all things. To be right and deal justly is to him the highest motives of life. In this school there are at present about seven hundred students. Dr. Still is a medium and Spiritualist—but has not blatantly heralded his knowledge of psychic law, because he realized that the person must be developed to understand before any one should try to convince. He has never covered the fact that he receives help from some psychic source. When asked a puzzling question his reply is familiar to the students: "Rub your head with a corn-cob and you will get the information as I do." He always indicates and indeed has frequently claimed to get spirit help. To the writer he told that the spirits taught him the system of osteopathy, and yet use him in the class-room to further unfold its possibility. He says the time has come for his school to teach psychology and psychic law.

With such impelling desire, he engaged us for a brief series of lectures. We held three meetings in his assembly hall and had crowded audiences composed of students and town-people. Mrs. Kates held a fourth meeting for women only, with one hundred and seventy present—mostly students; for osteopathy is peculiarly adapted to women practitioners.

Dr. Still addressed the assembly at our meeting and urged students and faculty to attend, saying that Spiritualism opens an invaluable exploration into the realm of life that every scientific mind must concede is proving the postulate of immortality. As this grand old man sets an example, so follows his confiding students. He is well-beloved by all, and has added us to his sincere admirers. There is no external gloss—but the mind and soul are polished by truth, love and devotion.

His welcome to the Spiritual pilgrims was sincere and hearty. He said we would not go away empty-handed, and we did not. He and our auditors were each and all generous. Our lectures were much commented upon and have stirred sincere investigation. The psychic demonstrations by Mrs. Kates were well received and generally recognized as stating facts that she could not obtain except by psychic quickening.

These large audiences representing so many from various sections of our country, will radiate a widespread influence. It is missionary work in a field that we shall hope for and expect further opportunity. We gratefully appreciate the hospitality of Dr. Still and family, and can recommend his school of osteopathy to all progressive students—and especially to our magnetic healers. Fraternally,

G. W. KATES AND WIFE.

WHEN I AM DEAD.

When I am dead let no friend weep,
My weary form finds rest in sleep,
No more to wake on earthly sphere,
No more to smile nor drop a tear,
No more to toil 'neath blazing sun,
My day is o'er, my work is done.
Let mother earth hide my remains—
My spirit freed seeks higher planes.

No friend should mourn at my demise,
Death opes the gate to paradise,
And we rejoin friends gone before,
And friendly hands we clasp once more.
A mother's smile, a mother's kiss,
Greets us across the dark abyss;
A father's arms once more embrace,
And finds for us a resting place.

My earthly form I have outgrown,
My mother earth reclaims her own,
Its elements again will blend,
With other forms, again will end,
Again will change, naught ever dies.
This fact we all must recognize.
Man's destiny is to progress,
Eternity is limitless.

A parting word to friends I leave:
No creed or dogma I believe,
No man of cant call to my bier;
My future fate I do not fear;
No priestly plan will ever save
Parson or priest, a saint or knave.
Act to each one a brother's part
And fear will leave your anxious heart.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever is Worthy in Every System.

NUMBER THREE.

Many investigators are discouraged because through ordinary mediums there comes so little particular statements regarding the exact conditions of a spirit's life and that little so hesitating, equivocal or non-committal. The prime reason is that ordinary mediums only stand upon the threshold and catch a glimmer of the within. Development consists in "going forth to meet the bridegroom," or "rising to meet him in the clouds of heaven." That is in plain language of attuning the nervous system to a higher rate of vibration and they have only oil enough in their lamps to go a little way requiring the spirit to come so far that frequently he or she is overcome by the rushing memories of an earthly life and by the mental atmosphere of the "circle"—an atmosphere heavy with the cares and fears, hopes, contentions and desires centered in the physical and unable to describe or even clearly remember the decarnate life. I have more than once been disappointed to hear a spirit, immediately upon taking control, say, "I want to tell you my friends about the life we lead away from you," then hesitate and drift into "tests," showing a knowledge of this world, and finish without another word to suggest that the spirit ever knew of any life but the physical one.

But there is a mediumship in which the sensitive more highly developed and living in a rarer atmosphere, permits the spirit to tell tales as a traveler from Europe would tell of life there. And some claim to possess a still higher development with the help of angel friends, leaving the physical body in a comatose condition and going into various spirit realms; returning with a vivid memory of their travels and purporting to give creditable pictures—word and color pictures as a traveler returned from the South Seas would publish in a magazine a story of life among various tribes. I might mention in particular Andrew Jackson Davis, who from the unconscious trance went on to the conscious—the "trance with my eyes open" of scripture, and from that to the other mediumship referred to; in all his experiences maintaining a divine simplicity of character, when he was reviled, reviled not again, as well as a sweet reasonableness of expression. Without surrendering your reason as to the percentage of absolute truth as distinguished from pure imagination, for as I shall point out you are all in possession of one great fact at least, upon which to base a logical inference, you will find the works of A. J. Davis conspicuous among those which stimulate interest in heavenly things. Let no one then condemn Spiritualism because so many mediums seem disqualified to deal with this matter until he reads some of those modern revelations and discovers that some spirits have other purpose in coming through the mists than to tell you who stole your jackknife.

Understand I am not denouncing the mediumship which allows and induces friendly spirits to interfere in earthly affairs; nor do I concede generally the point that they are impeded or degraded so. They should be allowed some judgment on this point themselves. There is abundant need of this mediumship and that old prayer, "thy kingdom come," will never be answered without it. Nor is there a sweeter and holier thought in any philosophy or religion than this of our loved ones passed away, maintaining their love and fellow feeling enough to be interested in what is of consequence to us in our condition. "Are they not all ministering angels." However this will not fully satisfy and I want to draw attention to the mediumship which more than inducing spirits to mix in earthly affairs induces and allures mortals to take an interest in celestial affairs, to become partakers of the heavenly life, etc. Even if all the institutions and conditions of life here were perfect and all religious thought rational there would be as much difference between our earthly paradise and a celestial heaven as between the best conditions conceivable in Labrador and Florida and the brightest and best would be as anxious as ever to realize the spirit consciousness. There would be a place at the top of our social structure for the most sensitive and it is time for the world to know that the child in the family—the man or woman in the community who is most responsive or mediumistic, is other things equal the highest product of civilization, of evolution or of God. This is the stone that the builders reject, but it is the keystone of your arch and all effort to realize an ideal social state without a recognition of this truth is disappointing. It was a partial acknowledgment that moved our ancestors to dedicate their favorite son to the priesthood and a distorted conception of this truth that nature allures the most gifted to the skies which underlies the notion that to God must be sacrificed the best animals and "first fruits." It also is indifferently recognized in the conviction that "the good die young."

Sunapee Lake Camp.

The Sunapee Lake Camp-meeting Association wish to announce that the meeting for 1902 will open Sunday, Aug. 3, and continue through the month, closing August 31. Arrangements for the meeting are nearing completion and it is confidently expected that the season will be a very interesting and profitable one spiritually. Good speakers and mediums will be in attendance, and the management earnestly desire the same sweet spirit of harmony to prevail as has attended us during late years.

The Forest House, kept by Mr. Frank Huntoon, is worthy of public patronage. Mr. Huntoon is a genial gentleman, a good landlord and understands the necessity of good food and plenty of it.

A new steamer goes upon the lake this season, and with the others of the Woodsum Steamboat Co., provides ample accommodations for all.

Special camp-meeting tickets are to be on sale at stations along the line of the Boston and Maine railroad. Programs may be had by addressing, with enclosed stamp, Mr. Thomas Burpee, Sutton, N. H. ADDIE M. STEVENS, President.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

The murder trial in the case of Michael Sierk, charged with the killing of August Jahnke, an old man with whom Sierk lived, has taken a sensational turn, at Alliance, Neb. Oliver Olson, the accused man's brother-in-law, has gone on the stand and confessed the entire plot which ended in Jahnke being slain. Olson relates that three different attempts were made before the murder plot was successful. Once the old man was poisoned, but they gave him too much and he vomited it all up. Twice he was shot at—the last and fatal time—the plan being to surround it with such circumstances as to make it appear that the killing had been a suicide. Sierk and Olson both left the country shortly after the old man's death, but suspicion attached to them and they were apprehended. Their interest, Olson says, in making away with him was to get a few hundred dollars Jahnke had saved. Olson declares he was under a hypnotic spell which Sierk exercised over him. He told a straight story on the stand, which Sierk's lawyers could not shake, but even as he testified cowered and refused to look Sierk in the face, fearing that he would again be put under the spell and influenced against telling the truth.

Capt. Bert A. Stout, public reader and ordained teacher of the I. F. T. Bible Spiritual Society of San Francisco, Cal., will officiate at marriages and funerals.

J. M. Hodson writes from Oddville, Ky.: "Independent Spiritualism is said to be young, but it has grown beyond the crawling period of development, and walks uprightly among other institutions of reform among the churches. Question: How can we find room for all sects to unite in one brotherhood, and hug the human family into her motherly bosom, without an organization to build upon? I am often asked what foundation have we to claim our cause to be a religion?"

Mrs. Jennie Jakeway writes from 1035 Market street, San Francisco, Cal.: "I have spent many seasons at Onset Bay, Mass. I am an old worker in the field. I am a trance and test medium, and am accustomed to platform work. Myself and husband are contemplating a trip East this summer, and would like engagements en route. We are both good hypnotists, besides my mediumistic gifts. We intend to go by the Southern Pacific route. We would be pleased to hear from societies desiring good earnest workers. Address as above."

S. K. Lisk writes: "I am very much interested in those letters from spirit land through Carlyle Petersilea, and sincerely hope the word which Spirit William Denton says has gone forth from spirit realms, that all the nunneries on earth and in spirit world shall be done away with, may speedily come true."

Mrs. Amanda Coffman, of Grand Rapids, Mich., writes: "Our society closed its meetings for the summer on May 25, with a goodly number present. I am pleased to state our society has no debts, and money in the treasury. Harmony prevails. I spoke for our society last Sunday, and June 1 for the First Spiritual Society of Lawton, in the town hall. The hall presented a very beautiful appearance, the rostrum being decorated with flowers and flags, which with the pleasant conditions and hearty welcome given me, made my work a success. Large audiences greeted me afternoon and evening. I go to Battle Creek, Mich., for June 15. I have the last half of June and from August 10 to close of camp season yet unfilled. I would also like to correspond with societies for fall and winter months. Will answer calls for funerals. Permanent address, 419 Crescent avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich."

Marc, the noted English allenist, tells of the famous case of a peddler who fell asleep on the highway, having by his side a sword cane which he carried as protection against robbers. A traveler in passing, stooped to arouse him, thinking he might be either ill or intoxicated. The peddler sprang up and stabbed him to death with the sword cane. He was convicted at his trial, although he pleaded that he did not know what he was about when he committed the act. Certainly the action of the human mind is curious. Who can fathom it?

William E. Bonney is stopping in the city for a few days and can be addressed at 40 Loomis street. He desires to obtain engagements at camp-meetings through the eastern states. Managers having open dates would do well to write him. He intends to make a visit to England where his parents are still living, and would like to become acquainted with eastern friends en route to the Atlantic coast.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood is located for the present at No. 121 Morgan street, Buffalo, N. Y., where he can be addressed for engagements.

The recent remarkable case of Henry C. Krause, who strangled his mother, has served to recall other instances on record in the history of medical jurisprudence where crimes have been connected with dreams and hallucinations. One of the oldest cases of the kind is that of the English gamekeeper who was killed by his son. Both were guarding from poachers the preserves on which they were employed, when the son, wearied with his long vigil, fell asleep. Upon being suddenly awakened he seized his fowling-piece and slew his father, evidently, in his half-awake condition, acting under the delusion that he was attacking a poacher. He was tried and convicted, but later was pardoned on the ground that, because he did not know what he was doing, there was no criminal intent to the action.

Ella A. Wheeler writes: "The Waltham (Mass.) Spiritualist Progressive Union church, Shepherd Hall, 185 Moody street, has just closed its season of Sunday services. Mr. J. Frank Baxter, of much renown, served the society the last three Sundays, with his usual interesting manner, and handling his subjects with much enthusiasm, showing the power of thought throughout. His audience was deeply interested in his lecture., "Spiritualism a Reality" embodying some of his earlier experiences. The spirit descriptions and tests were of the best. May 5 the following officers were obligated for the ensuing year: Mr. G. L. Clark, past president; Mrs. M. L. Sanger, president; Mrs. I. Vinal, first vice-president; Mrs. Martin Brown, second vice-president; Mrs. Ella A. Wheeler, corresponding secretary; Mrs. M. Guilford, treasurer. May 15, a reception was tendered Mrs. Sanger, the incoming president, and was a social success. Mrs. A. Pettengill, Mrs. J. Soper, Mr. Scarlett, and Mr. J. F. Baxter were the speakers of the evening. A social hour was spent in dancing, refreshments of ice cream, cake and frappe being served later."

Preparations are already being made for the annual Spiritualist camp-meetings of the state association, which will open at the grounds on Thursday, June 17. The meetings will not continue two months, but only six weeks as has been the custom. The executive committee, among other things, is preparing to dedicate the new auditorium. This elaborate building will be completed by the middle of next month, and possibly at an earlier date. It may be decided that the dedication of the new auditorium will be postponed until the opening of the state meetings, and the opening day will be an auspicious one. Arrangements for the dedicatorial address have been completed. It will be delivered by H. D. Barrett, president of the National Spiritualists Association. He will be assisted by Lyman C. Howe. This feature will be a great drawing card, and the attendance upon this date promises to be one of the greatest ever recorded. The association members are proud of the new structure. They have contemplated such an action for several years, but deferred the movement until the attendance became such that the patronage demanded more accommodations, and the work of building was then taken up. The building, when completed, will comfortably seat 3,000 people. It will represent a cost of several thousand dollars all of which is in the state treasury ready to pay off the bills when the work is completed.—Muncie (Ind.) Herald.

Harry J. Moore has the following camp-meeting engagements for the coming season: Jenison Park, Mich., July 20 to 26; Briggs Park, Mich., July 31 to Aug. 4; Marshalltown, Iowa, from August 24 to the first Friday in September, at which time he starts for Columbus, Ohio, to take charge of the church services each Sunday during the month of September. He will serve the Englewood Spiritual Union the first two Sundays in July.

Inability to recite the Lord's prayer is, in Fort Scott, Kansas, an offense punishable by a year's imprisonment. A girl who had stolen a horse and buggy was before Judge Simmons of that place, and he condemned her to five years in the penitentiary. Then he offered to make it four years if she would prove her ability to repeat the Lord's prayer. She could not, and he ordered the five-year sentence to stand. The Legislature of Kansas has passed no law declaring ignorance of the Lord's prayer to be a felony, but that omission does not trouble Judge Simmons. He is apparently one of those jurists, far too numerous, who draw on the 'reserved powers of the court' when they issue injunctions without warrant of law, send men to jail without trial, and otherwise do as they please regardless of Constitution and statutes. Judge Simmons, of Fort Scott, if the dispatch describing his treatment of the girl horse thief be correct, is unfit for the bench. No man is fit for the seat of judgment who is capable of trifling with the liberty of any person in his power, even though that person be guilty of falling below the Fort Scott standard in his or her theological attainments.—San Francisco Examiner.

There is no end apparently to the peculiar action of the mind. From Cleveland, Ohio, comes an account of a well-authenticated case, that of a prominent resident of that city. Out hunting and camping with a party of friends, he was suddenly awakened from sleep one morning and shot a member of the party in the back, inflicting a wound which caused paralysis. He was totally oblivious of what he was doing. In 1878 Simon Frazer, a Scotchman, dreamed that he was attacked by a wild beast, which he killed in his vision. When he awoke he found that he had dashed out his child's brains against the bedpost. Verily how wonderfully fashioned is the human mind.

At his home, 420 South Jefferson avenue, Aaron K. Penney last night celebrated the 85th anniversary of his birthday, surrounded by members of his own family, a goodly number of friends from other places, and many of his own townspeople. The occasion was a delightful one, and the entertainment afforded great pleasure to the guests. Mr. Penney being a believer in Spiritualism, the very entertaining program presented was to some extent of this character, and quite a number of those who participated in the pleasures of the evening belonged to that faith, or science, as one of them called it. Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, a well known medium, furnished an interesting part of the exercises. This was called "tests." The lady succeeded, to the satisfaction and delight of several members of the party, at least, in communing with departed friends, and as a final exhibition of her power, told the honored guest of his own dear ones who had gone before, but whom she said were standing by his side. She sang a song under spirit control, both words and music being, it was said, spontaneous. The lady has a delightful voice, the tune was sympathetic and the sentiment was sweet. The program was opened with instrumental music, followed by remarks by D. P. Dewey, of Grand Blanc, who was chairman of the evening. Mrs. Foster sang, after which Mrs. Marion Carpenter gave an address. — Courier-Herald, Saginaw, Mich.

Mrs. Florence E. B. Shaffer, who holds the degree of Bachelor of Oratory, writes from Houston, Tex.: "One of the latest stars to rise on the Spiritualistic horizon is that of the Independent Liberal Spiritualist Association. This is a feature of Spiritualism in Houston, Texas, at present. It is not localized, however, in as much as it has no limitation, but is characterized so broadly as to include the entire circle of spiritual possibilities. This association has three working branches or auxiliaries, consisting of the regular weekly social held at the home of the president, Mr. Thomas Muat, the weekly auxiliary held as announced from the platform, and the weekly public services held in Caledonian Hall, 1010½ Texas avenue, every Sunday night at eight o'clock. Mrs. Florence E. B. Shaffer is the regular speaker, having served since its organization, and chosen unanimously by the association. It has been said by one of our best latter-day thinkers: 'Whenever a class of people, however small, plant their feet upon a platform which knows no limits, we may be sure that class will broaden and expand.' We hope for the fulfillment of this truth in our midst, and hoping thus, earnestly rejoice in every effort being made everywhere for the growth and best success of all who endeavor to progress along lines best adapted to their individual needs. It is not presumable that all can profit by the same course of study. Were it so, the results of such study would all be molded or formed after the same pattern, and symmetry would be lost. Whereas, if all pursue, without resentment or interference with others, the way best suited for their own advancement, the well rounded form of progressive Spiritualism must necessarily be evolved."

Lyman C. Howe writes from Fredonia, N. Y.: "I took a run down to Elmira, N. Y., May 30, and put in a few hours at the meeting of the state association, and then on to Freeville, Tompkins county, N. Y., where I spoke twice on Sunday, June 1, and got back to Fredonia on the 2nd. I expect to be at home now until the opening of the annual picnic at Lily Dale, June 13. I expect to be at Bankson Lake Camp, in Mich., June 20 to 20."

C. H. Mathews writes from New Philadelphia, Ohio: "Through sickness and inadvertence, I omitted to mention that Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, those excellent missionaries in the great cause of Spiritualism, were here May 15, 16 and 18, giving us three lectures and a seance. The attendance was good, exhibiting a growing interest in the cause. It is to be hoped that the organization, which was effected here Dec. 9, 1898, may be resuscitated. 'Now, concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant.' (Cor. xii:6). This being a severely Christian community, the advice of St. Paul should be heeded."

Resumption of the Spring Hill Seances.—E. J. Schellhous writes: "At the close of the seances that gave the book, 'Beyond the Vail,' to the world, the spirit band announced their intention of giving another work treating on Life in the Higher Spheres. Arrangements are now being completed for the commencement of that work. Three seances will be given in each week. Those on Sunday and Thursday evenings will be devoted to the special work of the book, and Tuesday evenings will be given for visitors. Those at a distance who desire to attend, may address W. W. Aber in regard to all particulars concerning the seances. These seances are unique in character, affording absolute demonstration of spirit return and communion with those in earth life. Materialized spirits who in visible form appear in the presence of all in the seance room, talk and write and do wonderful things."

B. F. French writes from Bisbee, Arizona: "Several articles have of late appeared in spiritual papers anent the name of the force which is the basis of life, written by those who do not contend for or believe in a personal God. All logical atheists have no contention with those who admit the non-personality of the basic force of life; when that fact is admitted the atheists' case is won. It matters not whether its name is universal force, chemical force, spirit force, ethia, or what, so long as it does not imply personality or conscious entity. God is the foundation; yea, the very corner-stone of all priestcraft, and millions on millions of crimes are committed in his name; destroy this idea of the exstence of a God, and there will be no more tyrannical popes, sultans, or vicegerents to curse the earth with their vile pretensions. Men like Dowie and other fanatics who drive men to insanity by preaching of the wrath of God and the endless fires of hell, will lose their jobs. It is an axiomatic truth that false doctrines bring forth wrong deeds. Theology has crushed and shriveled the souls of millions for many centuries. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' The truth does not murder men, nor keep them in ignorance and spiritual bondage. Ignorance and falsehood are the parents of all crime."

J. H. Clark writes: "Geo. P. Colby, of Florida, is holding some very successful meetings at Spokane, Wash., this month. He is doing a good work. I think this would be an excellent field for some good live organizers. We would be glad to welcome one."

Axel Lundeberg writes: "I intend to give a public lecture on the following subject: 'Spiritualism, Its Past, Present and Future, or, The First Step, the New Message; the Second Step, the New Service and the New Ministry.' The lecture will be free and delivered in a public hall, time and place to be announced later."

The Southern Cassadaga Camp opens the first Sunday in February, 1903. The meetings continue six weeks, with seven Sundays. For information and programs, address with stamp, Mrs. J. D. Palmer, corresponding secretary, Willoughby, Ohio.

Lilly LeSieur writes: "Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond will be at one more Band of Harmony before going away for the summer."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

The annual camp-meeting of the Spiritualists of Summerland, Cal., will commence July 26, and close August 3, 1902. For full particulars, address Wm. P. Allen, secretary, Summerland, Cal.

Mrs. G. L. Ives, of Kalamazoo, Mich., writes: "Mrs. Emma Nutt Moore served the society here two Sundays in May. Her lectures were good and descriptions fine. Our hall was well filled. The society has closed its meetings until September. We received the last premium book, by Hudson Tuttle, and think it grand. We have the nine now. We have taken The Progressive Thinker ever since it was printed, and never missed but one paper, and that was the first one printed. We could not keep house without it. It has become our constant friend and companion. Its beautiful gems of thought are worthy of the highest praise. It is the best spiritual paper we can find. Success to your untiring efforts."

The forty-ninth anniversary of the Harmonial Society of Sturgis, Mich., will be held in the Free Church, Saturday and Sunday, June 14 and 15, 1902. Able speakers have been secured. Harrison D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., and editor of the Banner of Light; Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran, of Toledo, Ohio, and Rev. Thos P. Byrnes, pastor of the People's Church of Kalamazoo, will be the principal speakers. Several leading speakers and mediums have been invited and are expected to be present and participate in the meetings. Free entertainment will be provided all visitors, so far as the society is able to arrange. The committee will spare no pains to make the meeting one of the best in the history of the society.

Harriet Babcock writes from Saugatuck, Mich.: Friday evening the citizens of Saugatuck received a rare treat, one that will remain in the hearts of the people for some time. Mrs. D. A. Morrill of Grand Rapids, Mich., lectured under control, on the subject of Love, and the thoughts advanced were beyond anything ever heard here. As the religion of Spiritualism is new to many in our little town, there are some that have taken the step of investigation, and Mrs. Morrill's lecture teaches us that love reigns supreme. We hope to have the pleasure of listening to her again in the near future, and we will assure her of our hearty support. Mrs. Morrill also gives private sittings with the trumpet in the light, and gets fine results. She can be found at her home, 311 W. Broadway, Grand Rapids Michigan."

Mrs. C. M. Pine writes: "My father joined the United States Navy in 1812. He sailed on the Constitution, was shot in one of the battles with the British man-of-war, Peacock. One of the bullets is in the grave with him. He was obliged to leave the navy on account of his injury, but followed the sea for some years after getting well. On one voyage he had an experience which I think very strange. While in Brazil, he, with other's of his ship's crew while on shore stopped to talk with a so-called 'fakir' by the roadside. He asked father to look through a glass. Father did so and saw his mother standing by the kitchen door, washing milk pans. She turned her face to him and smiled. The scene changed, and a young girl came along. She had on a green silk hat and a red crepe shawl; she had a bundle in her hands. She turned her face to him, smiled and disappeared. He had never seen the face before. When he returned to New York his shipmate and chum, asked him to go home with him, and he went, my grandmother being up at Havestraw, on the farm at that time. While walking along Mulberry street, which, by the way, was not like Mulberry street is now, my father said, 'Oh, there goes the girl I saw in Brazil,' and just then the girl looked around and smiled, and ran in a near-by house. My uncle Robert Brown, for it was he, said: 'Why, that is my sister Fan; she will tell mother we are coming.' One of the sailors (who was with father), the fakir would not let look in the glass, saying, 'You will know your fortune soon enough.' Poor fellow, he was ordered aloft to fix the rigging soon after going on board, and fell and broke his neck."

Third annual meeting at Follett's Corners, Mich., on Sunday, June 22, 1902. Mrs. Marion Carpenter, of Detroit, and Mrs. A. E. Sheets, president of the spiritual camp-meeting, of Grand Ledge, will speak at 10 a. m. and 2 p. m., at the above named place, three and a half miles north of Bellevue. Everybody cordially invited. Bring your lunch basket, stay all day, picnic dinner. Collection to defray expenses. Arrangements have been made with George G. Sisco, to carry you for 15 cents each way, or 25 cents for round trip, for six or more. Hay furnished for teams at reasonable rates.

Mrs. Mary A. Blake writes from Haverhill, Mass.: "The Helping Hand Association of Spiritualists of Haverhill, Mass., a regularly organized and chartered society, holds meetings in Edney's hall, 82 Merrimac street, on Sunday evenings, to be continued through the summer. Sunday, June 1, was its fourth anniversary, and while no special observance of the day was made, a very interesting meeting was held, with a large audience assembled."

The Spiritual Reformer and Humanitarian, Galveston, Tex., Mrs. Susan J. Fink, editor and publisher. It is to be published monthly, and we wish it abundant success.

Mrs. Maggie Waite will hold spiritual services every Sunday evening, at 161 West Madison street, assisted by Prof. Burgess. Tests and lecture given at each service. Take elevator to fourth floor.

"Committee" send the following from Springfield, Mo.: "The South Side Spiritual Society had a surprise party, a business meeting, election of officers and a banquet, at the hospitable home of Brother and Sister E. R. Huxley, on Scott avenue. About thirty of our society were there, completely surprising the Huxley family, who intend going south for the summer in a few days. The formal greetings and pleasant talk gave way to the call for business by Mrs. M. Theresa Allen, and in its course the election of officers was announced, and here came surprise again in the unanimous choice of a Mr. Langdon for president, in place of Mrs. Allen, who desired the change on account of other duties. The following is a list of officers elected: President, Geo. W. Langdon; vice-president, Mrs. M. Theresa Allen; secretary, Mrs. Atlanta Phinney; treasurer, E. R. Huxley; trustees, James M. Allen, H. G. Hannaman and Miss Mary McCready; music director, J. E. Black. Mr. and Mrs. Allen are to retain full charge of all services, as heretofore. Springfield has in Mr. and Mrs. Allen two mediums that are fine speakers, highly educated, and strictly honest in what they say. We are to have weekly circles for members only, at their home in Grant street. In addition to this we will have lawn socials during the summer to add to the attractions of the society. There is a well organized society on the north side with a new building of its own and presided over by Mr. and Mrs. Folsom. The earnest work of the two societies will help spread the wave of spiritual truth over the land. The events of the evening were supposed to be over, when another surprise was in store for us. The Misses McCready, four young ladies known in the society as 'Our girls,' had captured the dining-room and when they opened the door and laughingly invited us to partake of the best of the season, we found the evening's pleasure had just begun. It was a feast of fruits, cakes, drinks, ices and flowers long to be remembered."

F. F. Neitzel writes from Spokane, Wash.: "McEwen, the hypnotist, has been engaged for two weeks at the Spokane Auditorium. He has a crowded house every night. Many who did not believe in hypnotism, mind-reading, spirit control, are convinced that it is a fact. I have seen other hypnotists, but this man is the best one I ever saw."

"POINTS FOR ATTENTION."

From the Secretary of the N. S. A.

To the Editor:—I find in your issue of June 7, an article from the pen of our worthy co-worker, Dr. Geo. B. Warne, president of the Illinois State Association, in which he cavils at the chartering of the Watseka Spiritual Society by the N. S. A., and the wrong work, at either the secretary's office in Washington, D. C., or by the N. S. A. board, in allowing the society in Watseka to be chartered. Dr. Warne closes his article by asking the N. S. A. secretary to look the matter up. I have just done so.

I can not learn when the official persons of the N. S. A. board announced in Chicago that the Illinois State Association had been granted a charter from this N. S. A., nor when or why the former secretary of this office wrote to Brother Warne, that a charter had been granted to Illinois State. I can only rely on the N. S. A. charter book, on the records of this office and on the application sent to this office from the Illinois State Association for a charter for exclusive jurisdiction. This application is before me in the book in which such papers are kept on file. It reads as follows after the printed matter of the application and in the blanks left for written matter, "To be known as the Illinois State Spiritualists Association of the State of Illinois, to have exclusive jurisdiction as follows, entire state of Illinois, and to be composed of delegate members of its subordinate societies, and of its own officers. For the purposes of State Association work."

This application is dated at Chicago, Cook Co., Illinois State, June 1, 1899.

The charter was then granted—it is charter number 224—and the word was sent to the Illinois State Board that no fee would be charged for the same—usual fee of ten dollars for a state charter—in view of the fact that Illinois, especially Chicago, had done so very well by its financial aid to the N. S. A., by mass-meetings and otherwise. The names signed to the application referred to above are respectively, Geo. B. Warne, James Freeman, Ella M. Johnson, Ervin A. Rice, Hiram Eddy, Orrin Merritt, W .W. Packard; their town address is also given.

Since the issuance of charter to the Illinois State Association, no local societies have been chartered in Illinois by the N. S. A. The disputed one of Watseka, was issued March 22, 1899, and is numbered 220. Illinois State charter is June, number 224. Watseka was chartered three months before charter was granted to the Illinois State Association. There were no lax methods of business, either by the N. S. A. secretary, or by the N. S. A. board in this connection.

As to Ohio State Association, for a period of nearly two years after the entrance of the writer of these lines, to this office, in which that state association was reported to us by its president, Mr. Bond, and by others of that association, as being practically dead—and I may say in passing, that no effort was made to revive it, till the N. S. A. convention was held in Cleveland two years ago. The president, E. W. Bond, answered our letters by saying that the Ohio State Association was in a comatose state, and would probably not be revived, and that the N. S. A. could charter any society in Ohio that applied to it. Since the convention at Cleveland, we have chartered no societies in Ohio. Our missionary, E. W. Sprague, has organized societies for the Ohio State Association, but none of these hold a charter from the N. S. A.

Mr. Editor, I only wish justice to be done; I present fact only, that can be easily verified from all our books, by a visit to the office of the N. S. A.

MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

Letter from Mr. Warne.

I am indebted to Secretary Longley for information that the N. S. A. issued a charter to the local society at Watseka, Ill., March 22, 1899, or over thirteen months after the Illinois State Association had been organized as auxiliary to the N. S. A., which action was taken at the Handel Hall meeting, held in February, 1898.

On September 16, 1898, Francis B. Woodbury, secretary, wrote me as president of the Illinois State Association:

"Your charter is granted, but I cannot deliver the same until paid for." He enclosed a list of local societies previously chartered in Illinois as auxiliaries to the N. S. A and said, "When universal jurisdiction is granted it simply stops us granting more charters in said state."

The N. S. A. was represented at the mass meeting in February, 1898, by its vice-president, Mrs. Richmond; its secretary, F. B. Woodbury, and Luther V. Moulton, who came for the express purpose of organizing a state association under the N. S. A. At the afternoon session following the election of officers Mrs. Richmond called them to the front of the platform, and introduced them to a large audience as the official board of the state association now auxiliary to the N. S. A. The letter heads of the state association used in its correspondence with the Washington office and others contained the words, "Auxiliary to the N. S. A." The representatives of the N. S. A. present at the Chicago meeting, in 1898, distinctly stated as an inducement to the Illinois Spiritualists to co-operate that the state association would have exclusive jurisdiction over its own territory.

Aside from the stubs of a blank charter book, should not the minutes of every meeting of the N. S. A. board record so important an action as to the voting of an auxiliary charter?

I withold comment on the N. S. A.'s real attitude towards state associations.

GEO. B. WARNE,
President Ill. S. S. A.

Exulting Over Judge Smith's Decision.

It is a long time since you heard from me, but strange things will happen sometimes. Spiritualism has now got a standing in California. Superior Judge, B. N. Smith, of Los Angeles, has come to the front and put our glorious religion on a solid foundation, so that the vampires of the old creedal doctrines that condemned babies to burn in hell can't interfere with our mediums any more by taxing or arresting them for being transmitters for the angel world. The bars are let down so that the loved ones who have gone before can come back and give the good news to the ones that are left behind, that there is no death, but life everlasting, and their mediums are free and in no danger of arrest. People outside of Spiritualism are waking up to the fact that it is a reality and a solid truth.

The great disaster at Martinique is plainly showing that God does not care much for his devotees, as he does not spare them, for saint and sinner are burned alike. The people will not accept the blind faith of the churches much longer, now that Spiritualism has a standing in the courts of the land, and I will predict that in a short time every judge in the United States will come forward and declare for the rights of mediums and Spiritualism.

In the World Celestial.

Dr. Bland is in receipt of a letter from Anthony Spinello, of New Haven, Ct., who says he has read his book, "In the World Celestial," and was so greatly delighted with it, that he translated it into Italian that his wife, who does not read English, might enjoy reading it in her own language. He says that if an edition of it could be printed in Italian it would have a large sale and do much good.

The second edition of "In the World Celestial" is out and is a great improvement, in appearance, over the first. The fact of it reaching a second edition so soon is substantial proof of its popularity.

The Color Line in Women's Clubs.

Newspapers opposed to equal rights for women are declaring that the action of the General Federation of Women's Clubs on the color question shows the unfitness of women to vote. At the utmost, it could only show the unfitness of certain club women. These critics overlook the fact that no color line has ever been drawn in the National Woman Suffrage Association, the National W .C. T. U., the National Congress of Mothers, the Woman's National Council. etc. While it is regretted that any association of women should draw the color line, it ought in fairness to be remembered that such action is not the rule with women's national associations, but, on the contrary, is the rare exception.

The Suffrage Association, the Mothers' Congress, the W. C. T. U., etc., are earnest women organized with a definite purpose to promote an aim which they believe to be good,. The members of the women's clubs are mainly society women, and the chief object of the clubs is social pleasure. It is natural that they should be less advanced in their ideas than the women of these other national societies. But they will grow; in fact, they are growing, and are doing more good every year.

Meanwhile it is preposterous to claim that their attitude on this question shows them to be less fit to vote than men. As the Boston Herald pertinently asks: How many clubs of men admit colored members? The action taken by the women at Los Angeles, while in every way regrettable, was no violation of law. They had the legal right to continue a rule that would keep colored women's clubs out. If the colored women's clubs had been already in the Federation and entitled to vote there, and if the white women had resorted to shot-guns and tisue ballots to keep them from exercising their legal rights, even then the women would have shown themselves no less fit to vote than many men. There is no evidence that color prejudice is either stronger or less strong in women than in men; but with women it certainly shows itself in much less violent and lawless forms than with the opposite sex.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

HARMONICS OF EVOLUTION.

The Philosophy of Individual Life, Based Upon Natural Science

As taught by modern masters of law. By Florence Huntley. An exceedingly interesting and distinctly valuable contribution to the literature of evolution, unfolding its laws from the deeper and clearer spiritual aspect, and indicating the defects of the Darwinian theory. Spiritualists and Materialists alike can gain much from its perusal. Price, finely bound in cloth, $2.

The Science of Spirit Return.

By Charles Dawbarn. A scientific rehearsal that is truly interesting. Price, 10 cents.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE,

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

H. H. Hutcheson, Kansas City: Q. I write for information regarding criminality in the United States. Can you give the number of members of the several leading churches, the number of criminals for each church and per cent per whole number? Or otherwise tell me where I can get such statistics?

A. This question has been presented in almost the same form by several correspondents and has been reserved for a long time, while I have vainly endeavored to secure reliable statistics, for as is well known those given by those wishing to make a case on either side have been untrustworthy. I wrote to Commissioner Carroll D. Wright, and received the following reply:

"The United States census for 1890 reported the number of criminals in the various penal institutions of the United States, from jails up to the highest class institutions, such as penitentiaries, but it did not give any facts relative to the religious training of the inmates. In fact, I know of no official document which deals with this side of the question. I have seen in the past twenty-five or thirty years fugitive and fragmentary statements based on individual inquiry, but nothing of sufficient prominence to warrant even a true conclusion relative to the religious training of criminals. I think if you will correspond with Dr. F. H. Wines, Assistant Director of the Census, Washington, D. C., you will be more likely to secure some specific reference to the topic you have in mind than from any person with whom I am acquainted."

Following advice, I wrote to Dr. Wines. His reply was less satisfactory. He said, that in response to questions about their religion, criminals were so untruthful, that no reliance could be placed in statistics gained in that way. Hence religion of convicts was omitted in the Census Report.

It then occurred to me that the reports of the individual institutions might furnish the desired information and as a trial the wardens of ten States prisons were requested to send their last reports. In only two of these is the religion of the convicts given. While education and illiteracy are always tabulated, the age, habits, number of terms served, nativity, sex, color, character of crime, trade knowledge, temperance, use of tobacco are carefully stated, not a word is given as to religious convictions, in eight of these reports.

The two that give the statistics of religion of the convicts so perfectly agree that we have no doubt that if every report had followed their example the ratio would be practically the same.

The Illinois State Penitentiary at Joliet reports for the two years ending September 30, 1900, that of 1,257 convicts the percentage professing no religious belief was 6.24; percentage professing religious belief, 93.76.

The other report is that of the Western Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, for two years ending Dec. 31, 1900.

Not an Infidel, not a Spiritualist in these prison walls! 93.76 per cent at Joliet had religious instructions in youth, and religious convictions, and in the Western Penitentiary, every one!

There appears to have been no trouble in gaining this knowledge, and the silence of the other reports and of the United States census, shows, not the lying proclivities of the criminal class, but the partiality and dishonesty of the Christian officials who dislike to place the obnoxious facts on record.

The report of the penitentiaries of Canada is made without favor, and it appears that there is no drawback to these statistics when the officials desire to gain them.

Of 1382 convicts in Canadian prisons, there were, Roman Catholics, 787; Church of England, 232; Methodist, 141; Presbyterian, 105; Baptist, 61; Lutheran, 23; other creeds, 31; no creed at all, 2. The lonely two are not Spiritualists nor infidels—they are creedless. Here are 2473 criminals, drawn from the province of Canada, and the great and representative states of Illinois and Pennsylvania, and the showing cannot be otherwise than a fair average, at least it may be truthfully claimed that in all Canada, Illinois and Pennsylvania, not a Free Thinker or Spiritualist is being incarcerated for crime.

"Decoration Day," LaCrosse, Wis.: Q. Who originated Memorial Day, and when?

A. It was first observed in the South in respect for the "lost cause." It was first observed by the women during the war. They selected the 26th of April and went to the cemeteries and decorated the grave of the fallen with flowers. In 1866, Alabama gave the day legal sanction, being the first to act.

In 1868, General John A. Logan, commander-in-chief of the G. A. R., announced that May 30 should be observed as Memorial Day. New York was the first state to make the day a legal holiday.

"Invalid": Q. Would health improve if the water we drink and air we breath were "sterilized," and thus freed from all germs of bacilli, microbes, etc.?

A. The experiment has never been tried, even by vivisectors on animals, of keeping them on a sterilized diet, and in sterilized air, yet it would be inferred from the part many germs take in the functions of the body, that disease and death would be sure to follow. There are ten species of microbes having use, and beneficial, to one that has an evil effect. In sterilizing air, water or food the one is destroyed with the other. Do not be afraid of microbes. The doctors when at a loss to account for a disease have ever ready the microbe! Infinitely small; it has a load to carry. The scape-goat of all sins! Do not be alarmed, for it is well known that the microbe of the most virulent disease will not find lodgment and flourish unless the blood furnishes proper soil. The constant talk of "microbes" and "germs" becomes wearisome, and one joins in repeating this expressive if not elegant verse:

"I want a chance to eat a meal without a 'microbe' yell,
To breathe a little atmosphere without a 'microbe' cell.
I long for that bright country of the peaceful and the blest,
Where bacteria cease from troublin' an'
the microbes are at rest."

"Temperance," Toledo, O.: Q. What is the cost of the liquor drank in the United States?

A. On the authority of the American Grocer, for the year ending June 30, 1901, the total cost of liquor to consumers in this country was $1,094,044,155; the cost of beer, $630,922,886, leaving the cost of the ardent spirits, wines, etc., at $463,721,269. But this is only the beginning. It is conceded that nine-tenths of all crime is caused by intemperance, and the poverty and destitution is incalculable. Appalling and incomprehensible as is this first cost, it must be multiplied several times to give the total.

Mrs. Geo. E. Case: Q. In automatic writing is it necessary to ask questions, or will the writing be produced in its own manner without any suggestion?

A. At times it is well to ask questions, as these serve to concentrate the mind—as when the hand hesitates, and writes disjointed sentences. But as a usual procedure it is better to allow the automatic writing of whatever the controlling influence desires. The personality of the communications is more marked and there is less opportunity for other or conflicting influences.

Mrs. K. C. Ames: Q. How can communications be received through the tipping of a table, other than by moving in response to yes, no, and don't know?

A. When questions are to be answered requiring more extended answers than yes or no, the alphabet is called, letter by letter, and there is a movement of the table when the right letter is spoken. This is somewhat tedious but long messages are frequently given in this manner. It is necessary for some one to write down each letter as the responses proceed. The same result may be obtained by moving a pencil over the letters, the table moving when the right ones are touched.

Spirit Photography.

It is, to me, a very remarkable fact, that Spiritualists throughout the length and breadth of the land appear to take but little interest in the only phase of spirit phenomena that is susceptible of conclusively proving the truths embodied in the teachings of Spiritualism, i. e., that there is no death and that the spirit, that which animates the living body, continues to exist after the change called death.

In spirit photography the Spiritualists have a class of manifestation which can be utilized to convince the whole world of the fact of spirit return. All other kinds of manifestations sink into insignificance in comparison.

There can be no such thing as mental cerebration on the part of any of the material of which the camera is made, nor of the glass composing the plate.

Suppose that the well-to-do Spiritualists would contribute a fund for the purpose of scientifically demonstrating the fact of spirit return, through photography, and were then to publish in book form the results of the tests, and pictures obtained, with photographed copies of spirits recognized, as well as original pictures furnished by the earthly friends of the spirits, and their certification of the facts of verification, and certificates of the photographic experts, detailing the modus operandi by which they had been obtained, would not such a work create a marked sensation and give great impetus to the spread of the doctrines of Spiritualism?

I have reason to believe that there are numerous spirit photographers scattered about the country, who do not know what to make of pictures they sometimes get, because of ignorance.

It is singularly strange the Psychical Research Society has not taken up this phase of the spiritual phenomena. Do you know of any reason for their neglect in this direction?

Do you know how many mediums there are now living who are recoghized as genuine spirit photographers? If so, please give names and address.

LOST EVERYTHING, AND DIED.

Old Bill Jones—a Hoosier man—
Was built on the Hoosier plan—
Blood, flesh and brains
To give him pains
He had.
His stomach ached sore from his birth,
His lungs would wheeze all they were worth,
His heart was slow,
And then would go
Like mad.

Bill Jones saw a doctor man—
One who worked on modern plan—
Who hawed and hummed,
And pinched and thumbed
His nose.
Then he got out his knives and saws
And carved on Jones without a pause.
"Your stomach's out!"
At last his shout
Arose.

For two weeks Jones was stomachless,
And then he told of great distress.
His heart, he said,
Was just like lead,
Or worse.
He sought the doctor man again,
Who got his knives and saws—and then
Bill's heart came next,
Although it vexed
His purse.

And after that Bill's lungs felt bad—
Another fee the doctor had.
Jones' chest was bare
Of all but air
Unbreathed.
The doctor next went searching for
More things in Bill's in-te-rior.
All nature's aids
Were sheathed.

He took Bill's brain—and thoughts, I guess—
And also made him liverless—
Removed his spleen—
The whole machin-
E-ry.
And now Bill Jones—a Hoosier man—
Is built on an immortal plan.
Through science deft
There's nothing left
To die.

THE ROMISH PRIESTCRAFT

Romanism in Its Essence and Its Results.

All religions evolved by human hearts and minds may claim to be Religions of Humanity. Every religion of humanity should certainly be a religion of the heart. But a religion of the heart should be a religion that draws the heart, gives scope for its affections, supplies objects for its love and fear, stimulates and expands its hope; a religion that puts the heart in sweet and trusting relation with providence and goodness, teaches it to say: Thy will be done, not mine; here I am, take me; use me; do with me what thou wilt; the Eternal Law be law for me; the Divine Will and Goodness be all in all.

How does this apply to the various priesthoods? In them Herbert Spencer said we behold "a hundred million Pagans masquerading as Christians." And this, I think, is true.

It is common to make a wide distinction between the Romish church as a government, and the Church as a religion, and to eulogize it in its latter capacity while denouncing it in the former. As a dominion, a tyranny, it is said the Church of Rome is detestable; as a religion it is admirable. It is the worst despotism and the best cultus on the face of the earth.

In secular affairs it shows itself the enemy of civilization and the cruel oppressor of mankind. In the spiritual realm it is supreme in loveliness as it is in majesty. "Liberals" have been known to call it a perfect form of religion, and express an entire willingness that it should be extended as a Faith, provided that it could be detached from all control of civil affairs.

Now here is a question: Is it a perfect form of religion? Even taking it at its best aspect, at its own estimate, is it the best form of religion? Is it best for any class? Best for any stage of culture? Is it best for any purposes of progress in society?

Is it so much better than any other, simply as a religion, that without reference to its political affinities or affiliations, in other respects, we should wish to encourage its growth or look with patience on its extension? Forgetting for the hour its cruelties, its persecution of conscientious men and women, its barbarities in the past, its abuses in the present, let us look at its more amiable side.

That the religion has been of great service to humanity in its day, preserving, in some, the pure quality of the heart from pollution, and keeping the wings of aspiration steady in a sky black with clouds and stormy with gusts of wind, is not to the purpose. The day before yesterday is not to-day. The question of Progress is a question of to-day and of the years that shall succeed to-day.

The Romish religion is commended on several distinct grounds; not only by Catholics but by Protestants. Even by rationalists who look on religion as an affair of social police, or at best as an affair of public taste.

It is commended as a system that brings the moral and spiritual conceptions within the reach of ignorant people, who, if they apprehend such things at all, must apprehend them by the senses. It is a religion of form, sound, color, demonstration, it is a sensuous faith.

Instead of an idea it gives an image, instead of a sentiment, it presents a symbol. Where Protestantism preaches about a dying God and an atoning Savior, Romanism plants a crucifix by the wayside, commands you to kneel to that idol. Where Protestantism dogmatizes about Christ, Romanism paints a picture of him. Protestantism appeals to conscience, where Romanism opens a confessional. Where Protestantism speculates on the mystery of the Godhead, and says "three times one is one," Romanism opens up a confessional and professes to forgive sins, or she orders silence and celebrates a mass. Where Protestantism describes virtues, Romanism groups angels and saints, always embodying its thought in visible, sensuous forms—ever appealing to the senses and ignoring the intelligence of her votary.

Eyes, ears, fingers, lips, are allowed the privileges commonly presumed to be granted only to intelligence.

Let us put even the best construction on all this. Drop the charge of idolatry, whereby the love and gratitude due to the creator and creative light is perverted from the Holy Life, and bestowed upon a man or woman; admit that the image, picture, sign, ceremony is only symbolical; that the plaster-of-paris figure is not an object of adoration but only a sensible help to it. Pass by the obvious danger that rude people will be unable to hold fast the fine distinction between the image of the Being it represents; we must still ask, does this system of signs and symbols perform the duty of a religion? Indeed it does not.

The visitor in any European cathedral will be capable of answering the question. And the answer will be emphatic, the nearer the cathedral is to the heart of the faith; more emphatic in Italy than in Germany, more emphatic in Rome than in Florence. The old proverb comes true, familiarity breeds contempt. They who can see or touch their deities do not as a rule revere them.

To the uninstructed and unspiritual, the symbol, instead of revealing the Divinity, obstructs him. We may be touched by the sight of the devotees kneeling absorbed in devotion on the floor of some ancient church, but their faces are wholly devoid of expression. It is only in semblance that they worship. They suspend their prayers in a moment to ask for alms, sometimes to pick a pocket. They are mendicants in the guise of devotees.

In the countries where sensuous religions prevail the essential religious sentiments, awe, reverence, aspiration, humility, are very low. In the common people the religious feeling scarcely exists at all. Their common oaths or expletives prove this. The painted, plastered, gilded god does not fulfill the office or communicate the presence of the Living God, the Inner Light of the Universal Soul.

Every fresh outbreak of religious faith has been attained by the destruction of images. It was so in Judea, as the prophetic writings tell. It was so in Asia, in Arabia, when Mohammed began his superb reform against image worship. In Italy, when Garibaldi broke their chains; in Germany; in England when Puritanism arose. The advent of the doctrine of the Living God into the mind, has always swept images away, as the fresh wind clears the air of flies or mosquitos.

It was by absolutely forbidding images representing Divine things under any form that Israel maintained its faith as it did in lands and ages given over to idolatry. The same is true of Islam.

The faith of Israel has been a more intellectual and spiritual faith in Europe than Christianity, and to-day it surpasses in these prime respects the average religion even of Protestant Christianity. The religion was from the beginning a training of the mind. By making incessant demands on thought and conscience, by limiting the away of fancy and sentiment, by removing the props of sense and compelling reason to use its own eyes, grasp with its own fingers and stand on its own feet, it roused a mental and moral activity that have been invaluable in the history and experience of the race. True, the education was a severe one, the backslidings were numerous; the lapses into seduction, idolatries, were frequent and deplorable, the recovery from them was slow and painful; but the end reached was worth all the effort spent.

The supremacy of intelligence and the consecration of the will is of such vast moment, the training of intelligence is of such difficulty, that as soon as possible we take away the child's picture-books and substitute thoughts for fancies.

Shall we think it wise to adopt a different method in religion? No, indeed.

To the assertion that the religion of Rome is still the best religion for the childish mind, I feel like replying: It is precisely for the childish mind or the mind thought to be childish, the mind uneducated, crude and immature, that it is not the best. Cultivated minds can understand and appreciate symbols and use them safely. Algebra proves it, but uncultivated minds cannot.

Illusions that are harmless to the enlightened may, to the unenlightened be fatally mischievous and bewildering. The sign to them soon becomes a divinity and a divinity that does not help. Not helping, it is neglected, then discarded, and in place of a religion, the cheated mall has superstition which is coarse and degrading in proportion as the symbol has been revered. With people of intelligence whose minds are occupied with solid thoughts, whose hands are busy with useful work, such a cultus might be harmless, but for the crude and imaginative, who can only change poetry into vulgar prose, it is no more nourishing than pearls are to swine.

A warm human religion will be a religion of the heart, a religion that recognizes the force of the saying: "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

God is God not by being an abstract definition or an "unverifiable hypothesis," but by being the Primal Soul and mind controlling Immensity, in synthesis with all things. The Absolute and unchanging Ego of the Cosmos; not a "Process of Becoming."

What in very truth is, is first either what we know or that of which we are ignorant. It is not abstract matter, nor the universal, nor the particular, nor the ego per se; absolute existence is the synthesis of subject and object, of universal and particular, of ego and non ego. There is One and only One Absolute existence which is strictly necessary. The spirit substance in which this knowledge inheres is the Living Light of the Inner Life.

When these priestly cults proclaim that "God is Light," do they bring or seek to bring that truth to the understanding of their votaries? Truth uncomprehended is certainly not a revelation to such persons.

"There is a principle which is pure, placed in the human mind, which in different places and ages hath had different names; it is, however, pure and proceeds from God. It is deep and inward, confined to no forms of religion nor excluded from any, when the heart stands in perfect sincerity. In whomsoever this inner life takes root and grows they become brethren."

Those are the words of John Woolman, the Quaker! The experience of each can verify their truth. "The just shall live by faith," said of the faithful it may be truly said:

"They never fail who die
In a great cause! The block may soak their gore,
Their heads may sodden in the sun, their limbs
Be strung to city gates and castle walls,
But still their spirit walks abroad. Though years
Elapse and others share as dark a doom,
They but augment the deep and sweeping thoughts
Which overpower all others and conduct
The world at last to freedom."

A Learned Professor Was Startled.

"Washington, March 13, 1855.

"A laughable development in spirit knocking was made in this city yesterday. Prof. Henry, of the Smithsonian Institute, the most learned and scientific man in the nation, together with another professor from the same Institute, just to gratify a morbid curiosity, secretly called on the Misses Fox, who are giving levees here, to hear the raps and laugh at the humbug. With an air of learned indifference and grinning incredulity, the professor entered the room and seated himself at the table. The first rap sent the blood from the surface to the heart, and he looked the very ghost.

"A question was asked, loud raps responded; the professor sat aghast for a moment, when he suddenly and convulsively grasped both hands into his hair and exclaimed; 'My God! It is true!' He jumped from his chair, ran to the window, and so frightened the (Fox) girls that they left the room, fearing he had gone mad. Just at this juncture, the Hon. Reverdy Johnson, who is a strong believer, came in and quieted the nerves of the excited professor. After calmness was partially restored, he expressed his regret for coming there; for seeing, and being compelled to believe, what he had always considered a most wicked hoax and humbug. He was sorry that it was true, but found relief when Mr. Johnson assured him that one-half the members of Congress were believers, and the balance were bound to be, so soon as their prejudices would allow them to witness the phenomena.

"The professor (Henry) had never yet found a nut he could not crack, and he is determined not to give this up without another trial. So, to-day he invites the Misses Fox, Mr. Johnson, Ex-Gov. Tallmadge, of Wisconsin, and the 'subscriber,' to visit the Institute and there, in the midst of the concentrated learning and genius of the nation, demonstrate the mysteries of the new theory. I will give you the facts in detail."—"Clifton," in Cleveland Plain Dealer.

It is to be hoped that the Plain Dealer correspondent, "Clifton," survives the vicissitudes of time, after 47 years, and is able to corroborate the foregoing. He was a bold correspondent to have written as he did at that time. If on "This side of the Vail," he must have passed the 32d degree mark, which, in the nature of things, is hardly probable.

While I am transcribing this article the spirits are manifesting their presence by loud raps in recognition. As I am not a "medium," they must get their power from "above." I do not think "the Devil" can help them. Yours fraternally, C. H. MATHEWS.

AN INCIDENT.

The Cyclone of Life—A Spirit's Message.

Colloquially speaking, "Every dog has his day." This is a very true saying, both literally and figuratively speaking. We apply this same adage to literature, and find all themes have a run clothed in the garments of fiction, to die out as quickly as they came.

Apparently, superstition and its consequences are now upon the market in the journalist world, and many weird tales are being told in the columns of the daily press. I have read several, but find none that coincides with a very nerve-racking incident of which I was the victim a short time ago.

There are no dark rooms, suggestive minds, somnolent phenomena, heavy, bolted doors, requests for my head by headless spirits, chopping-knives thrown at my door, sharp double raps on my door, no doors barricaded with heavy furniture, or barred by heavy chains, in my story; but an innocent-looking document, only; the contents of which haunt my trembling soul.

It is written in a very poor and vague hand-writing; not mine, for I am a book-keeper. The "I's" are not dotted, and it contained no punctuation marks; not mine, for I am a student of journalism. Not my theology, for it is, in part, reverse to my theories. I make the above citations, not as an egotist; but to prove the theory that my hand was controlled by a spirit and not by my own material forces. It seems that while I now write, I can feel the author of it standing over my shoulder to prevent me from spoiling it by the application of rhetorical rules.

It was one afternoon last summer. Wearied by my studies, I strolled out into an old sugar camp, five miles from Silver Bay on the shores of Lake Erie. The silent grandeur of the woods, the lapping of the waves, as they beat upon the cliffs, enchanted me. I wandered into the sugar-house and sat down on the rough board bench to rest. What happened during the following two hours is a mystery to me. However, I cannot but admit the existence of this crude piece of literature which was penciled with my own fingers. I shall reproduce it word for word, but in a more readable manner.

THE CYCLONE OF LIFE.

'Twas night. I stood upon the rocky cliffs which stayed the force of old Lake Erie. The sun was sinking 'neath the western skies. The swells broke on the rocks and gamboled in the crevices. Their musical gurgle was so immensely fascinating that I tarried by the lake-side and listened. Gazing into the valley, to the south, I saw nature garbed in peaceful beauty. But, lo! what was that? Again I heard it! Hark! 'Twas distant thunder. I asked myself if it was an approaching storm. Soon the many brilliant sunbeams were swept from the crimson horizon. Father Time had drawn the somber curtains of darkness. Rum-rur-ru-rur Clap-p-Bum-m- and a frightful clap spoke the nearness of the approaching storm. Here and there the clouds flew like mighty war chariots. They changed from crimson to steel gray; thence to a black, smutty color. Knowing the significance of those musty clouds, I sought shelter in this same cabin. Suddenly all was in darkness. The homes in the valley were enveloped in the misty shrouds of an approaching cyclone. Hark! Cla-a-p-p! rur-ru-rur-rum! a flash—a roar—and a fork of lightning flashed, like a heated chain, fired from a cannon by the wrath of God, and splintered a noble oak near by.

The huge wind-clouds were now sending everywhere. Drop-drop-drop—and the rain came down in torrents. Hail stones, as large as marbles, pelted against the hut and I thought of the days of war.

Soon the winds were howling like the giants of old. Trees, fences, bushes, and houses were sacrificed to the dynamistic powers of the unseen. But at last the storm abated. The winds and rains died down. Black clouds gave way to the white heat clouds; night sent forth her dimmed moon. I arose, as if a trance, and stood, once more, upon the spray-wet cliffs.

The waves were dashing their spray fathoms high into the atmosphere. They frothed, boiled and roared far louder than the retreating artillery on the battle-fields of "Thunder." I vividly comprehend Milton's elucidation of the "Deluge." Filled with horror, I left the scenes in meditation. I still seemed as one asleep. I thought not of the sailors out at sea; but gradually my mind came back into the animate sphere and I was frightened; for I thought of my loved ones at home.

Ah! yes. Although I have left your old of materialism, I still remember results of those few hours of destruction. As I approached the village, I was blinded by the cruel sights; the crying injured, the howling of dogs, moaning of mangled animals and sights of destroyed homes. Realizing the true situation, I rushed on, like a man-man, to meet my consternation. A wailing crowd; two lifeless forms; a mangled wife and child thwarted my vision. I screamed, "My God—and is it thou who perpetrates such evils? Is it thou who ruleth all things and killeth when thou saith "Thou shalt not kill?" Forgive me! For I cannot longer worship such a monster," and I spoke no more.

My physical body ceased to be a coil of encumbrance and my soul was freed from prison. I searched not for my master; to me he was a monster—not a God. I searched and found my family which was so unmercifully snatched from animality.

Ah! yes, long years have passed, but you are the first person who has lingered in this cabin. And my unseen fingers are piloting your hand, that people might learn, through you, the secret of the immortal world. To tell humanity that heaven differs from earth, only in the possession of perpetual happiness. We wear no wings. We labor to eliminate our more unfortunate brother spirits, and are happy. Believe me; 'twas not the workings of a worshiped God that wrought such havoc; but the results of natural, stupendous, unconceivable, uncontrollable, dynamistic forces which are the cause of all life. Whether it be in the physical or the world's immortal.

Yes, I now live the life that mystifies my worldly brethren. I have been taught to look back and see the errors of my organic existence. By these teachings I have suffered a spiritual refraction, and have been made whole. Awake, dormant soul! You must hear these grand truths of the spirit world! Fear me not! for we of the spirit know of but one creed: "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

This goal is the terminus of Life's cyclone, and the terminus of the kingdom of heaven. I taunt ingly ask:
O death, why do ye mortals dread it?
O grave, the prize, you've lost it?

For the spirit of my physical life has escaped you, and I am happy.

MAN'S Mighty Power OVER HIS FELLOW-MAN

THE SECRET REVEALED AT LAST.

Astounding Discoveries Which Prove That People Can Actually Be Influenced and Controlled for Years Without Dreaming They Are Under the Mystic Spell of Another.

How It Is Done—A Powerful Secret Method of Mind Control, by the Side of Which Hypnotism and Kindred Influences Sink Into Insignificance.

At last the true secret of mental power and mind control has been revealed. A noted college in the city of New York has just issued a wonderful book by eminent scientists, which lays bare the mysteries of personal influence. Five thousand copies of this remarkable work are to be distributed free of charge for the purpose of acquainting the public with this mighty mind power.

This wonderful new force gives a control and an influence over persons that would astonish and mystify the most powerful hypnotist who ever lived. It enables you to know the secret natures and lives of every one you meet; you can tell the character, abilities and entire nature of your correspondents though thousands of miles away. You can exert a strange silent influence over others in your presence or at a distance entirely without their knowledge. You can quickly develop your will power, memory and other mental faculties to a marvelous degree. You can by a new secret process, quickly cure bad chronic diseases and build up your own health and strength in an incredibly short space of time. It explains the most marvelous system of physical and mental development known to man. It truly reveals the secret power of charming, the art of fascination. You can win and hold friends without number. You can master the secrets and know the power of the wise men of old. You can acquire that inward confidence, that magnetic power that will enable you to overcome all obstacles to success, and rise to a position of prominence in your community. The book is enthusiastically endorsed by ministers of the gospel, business and professional men. It is a work which should be in every home. This wonderful new work is entitled "The Secret of Power." It fully explains the uses and possibilities of the marvelous "Ki-Magi" system of personal influence. It lays bare the mysteries of magnetic control. It gives you a veritable key to the souls of men. It is richly illustrated by the finest half-tone engravings. It is by far the most remarkable, interesting and thrilling work of the kind ever written. For a limited time it will be sent to your address absolutely free. "In your 'Ki-Magi' System I have found what I for years searched for in vain," writes Mr. Joseph Steiner, 1100 Ninth street, N. W., Washington, D. C. "It has changed the whole trend of my thought and given my life a new meaning. I feel younger and stronger every day. I find in it the key to business success." W. Rockwell Kent, of Binghamton, N. Y., writes: "Your Ki-Magi System is the most powerful agency on earth for the betterment of man. All who master it will become a power in the world and be successful and happy."

S. I. Yetter, of Middletown, Pa., says: "The 'Ki-Magi' System of personal influence has brought me the success in business for which I have been looking. It is the magnet which controls. There is no guesswork about it—it is a scientific fact. It has taught me to know and control myself as well as others."

Felix Moosbrugger, of 270 Halsey st., Newark, N. J., writes: "Many are the swindling deals I have avoided in my father's business through my knowledge of your system. The change which has taken place in my personal character is simply marvelous. I have developed a confidence and power in myself that I never dreamed I could acquire."

Col. C E. Tuller, of 1201 Euclid ave., Cleveland, Ohio, says: "My success in curing afflicted people is absolutely wonderful. A boy given up for sure death by five physicians I restored to perfect health inside of five minutes. A woman that could not touch her foot to the ground on account of rheumatism was cured by one application of the method explained in your system.

If you wish a free copy of the book which started Mr. Mossbrugger, Col. Tuller and others on the road to success, write to-day to the Columbia Scientific Academy, office 150 W, 1931 Broadway, New York, and the book will be sent you by return mail, postage prepaid.

Three Journeys Around the World

—OR—

Travels in the Pacific Islands,

New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, India, and other Oriental countries. By J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D. In this splendid large book Dr. Peebles has concentrated a vast amount of valuable information. It is exceedingly entertaining and readable, and Spiritualism as he found it everywhere in his travels receives due attention, making the book of special value and interest to Spiritualists. 454 large pages, finely bound, at the price of $1.50.

"THE DREAM CHILD,"

A Fascinating Romance of Two Worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price, cloth, 75 cents. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times.

THE DESCENT OF MAN.

By Charles Darwin. Cloth, gilt top, 75 cents. On its appearance it aroused at once a storm of mingled wrath, wonder and admiration. In elegance of style, charm of manner, and deep knowledge of natural history, it stands almost without a rival among scientific works.

WOMAN: Four Centuries of Progress. A Lecture delivered at the Freethinker's International Congress, Chicago, Ill., October, 1893. By Susan H. Wixon. Price, 10c.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

Historical and critical review, with replies to an objection. By G. W. Brown, M. D. Price, 15c.

Practical Methods to Insure Success.

A valuable little work, full of practical instruction in matters pertaining to physical, mental and spiritual health. Worth many times its cost. Price 10 cents.

ASTRAL WORSHIP By J. H. Hill, M.D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

The Christ Question Settled.

Jesus, Man, Medium, Martyr. A symposium by W. E. Coleman, J. S. Loveland, Hudson Tuttle, Moses Hull, J. R. Buchanan, H. B. Hill, Rabbi I. M. Wise, Col. Ingersoll—and what the spirits say about it. By J. M. PEEBLES, M. D. Whether this book settles the question or not, it will be found eminently entertaining, and brings together a mass of evidence to establish the historical character of Jesus. A large volume. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

MAHOMET His Birth, Character and Doctrine. By Edward Gibbon. This is No. 6 of the Library of Liberal Classics. It is conceded to be historically correct, and so exact and perfect in every detail as to be practically beyond the reach of adverse criticism. This work will be found intensely interesting. Price, 25 cents.

Crimes of Preachers.

An interesting book along its line and useful to Spiritualists attacked by the clergy and their followers. Price 25 cents; for sale at this office.

THE WORLD BEAUTIFUL.

Series one, two and three. By Lilian Whiting. Three choice volumes, each complete in itself, in which spirituality is related to everyday life in such a way as to make the world beautiful. Price, $1.00 each.

STANDING UP FOR JESUS,

Or what the Editor of the Freethinker's Magazine thinks of him. Price, 4 cents; twenty-five copies for 50 cents.

SPIRITUAL SONGSTER.

By Mattie E. Hull. Thirty-eight of Mrs. Hull's sweetest songs, adapted to popular music, for the use of congregations, circles and families. Price, 10 cents, or $3 per hundred.

A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS,

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

OLD AND NEW PSYCHOLOGY

By W. J. Colville. Reports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume. Price, $1.00.

THE WOMAN OF ENDOR.

Ancient and Modern Spiritualism.

One of the great objects of "Christian Endeavor" or of the orthodox church, is to purge the Bible of every vestige of support of Modern Spiritualism. It is past understanding, that the church will accept, believe and defend every Bible narrative except those which in the least favor the truth of spirit return.

No matter how ridiculous, absurd, incredible and impossible a Bible story may be, if it savors not of Modern or ancient Spiritualism, it is received with open arms by our Christian friends of the creeds.

Here and there, there are dropping out of the church of all denominations, men who are honest enough to openly declare their disbelief in Bible stories far more incredible than the story of "The Woman of Endor," because the latter is now corroborated daily throughout the world by such men as Hyslop, Hodgson, James, Coues, Wallace, Crookes, Gibier, Flammarion and thousands of others equally able and brave enough to give a reason and a proof for the knowledge that is within them of the truth of Spiritualism.

Prof. Pearson has recently left the Methodist church because he could not believe the story of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego in the fiery furnace, nor that of Elijah dividing the water by smiting it with his mantle, raising the dead, etc., nor that of Moses dividing the Red Sea, nor that of Elisha making an ax to swim, etc.

And now comes the news that the New York Presbytery a few weeks ago, refused a minister's license to a young theologian, Vincent Noll, because he questioned the existence of Adam. Mr. Noll became ill and died of grief. The Presbytery at a later meeting reversed its former action and decided to accept the young man, but it was too late, for Noll never learned of his success. He was dead when the news reached his home. If Mr. Noll had said that he disbelieved the story of the "Woman of Endor," the Presbytery would have received him with open arms.

Rev. J. M. Buckley, editor of the New York Christian Advocate, and a prominent theologian in the Methodist church, believes and accepts all the Bible stories which Prof. Pearson has rejected as mythical and legendary, but the story of the "Woman of Endor," he explains as follows:

"Saul, who was a man of strong passions, feeble judgment, and little self-control, had sinned, and God refused to hear him. With the Philistines visible at distance of four miles, encamped in a better position than his own, being forsaken by God, his heart sank within him, and he determined to know the worst. Taking his servants into his confidence, he sought out a professed witch, or necromancer. Having received an oath that she would not be punished, she began in her usual way.

"'Whom shall I bring up unto thee?' This was her professed business. 'Bring me up Samuel!' Immediately afterward the woman cried with a loud voice, and said to Saul, 'Why hast thou deceived me, for thou art Saul?' There is a strong presumption that she would have known him under any circumstances. He was head and shoulders above all the people; his face must have been familiar; his camp was less than twelve miles from her cave. It is incredible, in that small country, with Saul ranging over it, and great public processions, that the witch had never seen him. Said he, 'Be not afraid.' She said 'I see gods ascending out of the earth.' 'What form is he of?' 'An old man covered with a mantle.' Then Saul, who never saw anything, but depended upon her description, perceived that it was Samuel.

"What such women did in those times they are doing now in the East. She had retired—her cave, according to the Oriental custom, being divided by a curtain—and had been performing her incantations and muttering. It has often been remarked that when such a giant as Saul appeared and said, 'Bring me up Samuel!' the witch must have been indeed a foolish woman not to suspect who he was that made such a strange request. Before Samuel is represented as speaking she knew that her interlocutor was Saul. Her motive for pretending not to know him at first was to increase her influence over his mind—a common device of such performers.

"Before the witch spoke the words attributed to Samuel, Saul had given her all the facts that she needed to form the answer, in this full description of his situation and confession of helplessness and distress: 'I am sore distressed, for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams; therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do.'

"The answer plainly consists of things which Samuel had said while living, and of things that could be conjectured from the situation. It is not necessary to assume that the woman was wholly a deceiver. Possibly she believed that her incantations brought up the dead, and she may have fallen into a species of trance in which she imagined the character suggested by her applicant. If so, she would naturally imitate the tone of the supposed responder, and would speak to a great degree in harmony with what the character might be expected to say under the known circumstances. The narrator, as certain ancient church decrees, according to Reginald Scot, declare, 'set foorth Saule's mind and Samuel's estate and certeine things which were said and scene, omitting whether they were true or false.'"

Thus writes Rev. Dr. Buckley of the story of "The Woman of Endor," whom he calls a "witch" without any scriptural authority whatever. Had he written as skeptically of the story of Jonah and the whale, he would have been invited down and out from the editorial sanctum of his paper, if not expelled from his church. And which of the two stories is the more credible? Which one of the two receives the support of modern investigation? Which one of the two would now be accepted by the American Psychical Research Society?

As Dr. Buckley further writes, "The account of the Witch of Endor is the only instance in the Bible where a description of the processes and results is given. Whether any one appeared to the witch, and if so who, has caused endless debate. Lange gives a summary of the different views. The Septuagint and the Apocrypha represent that it was Samuel, and Justin Martyr held the same; Tertullian that it was a pythoness, exclaiming, 'Far be it from us to believe that the soul of any saint, much less a prophet, can be drawn forth by a demon;' Theodoret, Justin, Origen, Ambrose, Augustine and some Jewish rabbis held that the 'appearance of Samuel' was produced by God's power; and Delitzsch, Hengstenberg, and other moderns support it. Luther held that it 'was the devil's ghost;' Calvin that it 'was not the real Samuel, but a spectre,' Grotius thought that it was a deceptive spirit."

It would be interesting to have Dr. Buckley's opinion of the modern "Woman of Endor," Mrs. Piper, for example. He would hardly call Mrs. Piper a "witch," and yet she has for years furnished phenomena pronounced genuine by eminent college professors, which are of the same character as that sample of mediumship related of the "Woman of Endor." There is much more than sufficient evidence in the world to-day to establish the probability of the truth of the story of the "Woman of Endor," however incredible other stories of the Bible may be.

NATURE'S LAWS.

Poetic Previsions of the Future.

Amid the recent awful calamities that have occurred in the West India Islands, and the repeated disasters occurring in the different parts of our disturbed earth, it is encouraging to look forward and contemplate some of the great possibilities of the future in the marvelous progress and growth of the human race.

That the onward march of science and discoveries will be even more rapid than in the century which has just closed cannot for a moment be doubted. Onward and upward is the watchword of civilization, and the unceasing flow is steady and inexhaustible.

The human mind is just beginning to solve some of the intricate problems of nature that no previous age had discerned so fully or could have had the faintest conception of, and these discoveries are making for righteousness and unity of races all over the inhabitable earth.

Electricity, the wizard force, is one of the most important discoveries and factors in bringing about these marvels of changes in civilization that marks the present epoch of our new era, and is the keynote to the unlocking of yet other wonders in the arcana of nature.

The recent invention of war appliances, so powerful an agent of destruction of life that the annihilation of great armies is a certainty, making hostilities of nations absurd, is the beginning of the age when arbitration of difficulties between nations will be established and the reign of fraternity and brotherhood will take the place of the present barbarous condition of war.

We begin to realize that over all in all the infinite mind reigns, that one spirit, one law, one design has been pushing the baby world into higher, broader fields, and that the great future will be written on grander pages of nature's revelations.

The laws of nature are the words of God speaking through all manifestations of power, whether it be of destruction or of construction, revealing the beneficent rule and wisdom of an all-conserving power for good underlying every change in the great universe.

Looking with eyes clairvoyant, listening with ears clairaudient, feeling the boundaries of infinitude and the songs of infinite worlds, one cannot doubt the onward march and growth of man and worlds, and feel that through man will be revealed the secrets of nature by the mighty throbbings of God's will and to the perfecting of all things spiritual and physical, worlds without end.

Through all in all some mystic power speaks,
And man this inward voice daily seeks;
With eagle wings he soars in loftiest flight,
And counts no cost too dear a sacrifice for right;
For lo! the place he fills is not of earth or time,
But with his soul's ideal life sublime.

BISHOP A. BEALS.

Life After Death.

It is not given to every man to write from the misty shores that lie beyond, but sometimes we are greatly blessed in being bidden to seek for a way of sending to the people of earth a few lines that we trust will help them to better prepare for the change called death. It truly is a change, and a most welcome change. Not, perhaps, just as we have pictured it in our minds, but to those who have striven to help others, and to build up the truth regarding the spiritual life, while living in the earthly body, it is a most blessed privilege to continue on in the good work, although not clothed in the habiliments of earth. When one can grasp the main idea, that of good done to their fellow men, and put it into everyday practice, they have gained a great and lasting advantage over the evil that surrounds mortals, and also the spiritual people, especially those of the earth-plane, or "earth-bound," as many will better understand. On the earth planet you use money to obtain your desires. Here you do so many good deeds for one desire. It is a good plan to have a well-filled bank of good deeds here before you come yourself. The opportunities are so much greater on the earth planet, and good deeds and loving service so much easier to do, that I would all could understand the great necessity for all such. For this time of writing my time is limited, and I can only add a few more words. How few of us understand the meaning of the words "spiritual world." The world of spiritual men and women. The spiritual world is divided into many planes or places, and no one that belongs to the "Power of Light" is idle. Influence tells for a great deal on earth; it tells for more here. Some of us have not finished our earth work; we must stay close to earth until we have done all that is ours to do.

Others have no earth work, but must toil for the unredeemed. Others may rest for a time. The laws are beautiful here, and we strive always to obey. I really am glad my earth work was not finished when I was called hence. I hope to advance by writing much of interest to many.

WHAT IS A POEM?

What is a poem? 'Tis a beautiful flower,
Blooming alone,
On a ruin now crumbled, forgotten, unknown.

What is a poem? 'Tis the dewdrop that sleeps
On the pale lily's leaf.
'Tis the teardrop that hangs on the eyelids of grief.

What is a poem? 'Tis the storm on the ocean, when in anger, doth roar;
'Tis the foam-crested waves that break on the shore.

What is a poem? 'Tis a sunset, whose banks of bright yellow gold,
Piled high in the heavens, fair treasures untold.

What is a poem? 'Tis the lightning's swift flash, that darts from the sky.
'Tis a gleam of red wrath, from a demon's fierce eye.

What is a poem? 'Tis the angel of death, that bears in its hand,
A message of love from the fair spirit-land.

What is a poem? 'Tis the low range of hills, in the blue and the gray,
Where the horizon blends, at dawn of the day.

TALMAGIANISM.

The World Has Had a Surfeit of It.

The Progressive Thinker of May 10 gave an address on the late Dr. Talmage by Mrs. Cora Richmond, in which she took the ground very correctly, that he was one of the best of the old theological school, and that the world would be relieved of one of its burdens in his passing.

All persons out of the theological ruts thus think. The Chicago Flaming Sword recently expressed itself along the same line very admirably.

But we cannot quite congratulate ourselves that Dr. Talmage is no longer before the world as its arch deceiver in religion. His son, Frank DeWitt Talmage, who now poses as a Rev. Dr., is the pastor of the Jefferson Avenue Presbyterian church, I believe, in Chicago, and lively press agents have already taken him in hand to give forth productions for the people similar to those of his father. All the papers that have printed Dr. Talmage in the past are now expected to print his son, and if the matter is not checked there is a possibility that for another fifty years we may have a surfeit of the same theology that we have had for the last fifty.

Now, the American Press Writers' Association has in it a large number of Spiritualists, and I suggest that these writers forthwith begin to show up the Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage wherever he appears, that they may educate the ones partial to hypocrisy and religious humbuggery away from his delusions and thereby slacken the demand for the Talmagian articles.

By doing the above, and by sending marked copies of such articles to the gentleman himself and to his friends and foes likewise, a great and good work can be accomplished.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

James A. Sanford, of Grand Rapids, Mich., passed to spirit life, May 10, at the age of 64. He had been a Spiritualist for over thirty years. He was a good man and highly respected. He leaves two daughters to mourn his loss. The services were held at the Universalist church, the writer officiating, assisted by the Rev. Elliott Cooley; Mrs. Augusta Ferris and the K. of P's. had charge at the grave.

MRS. AMANDA COFFMAN.

Mrs. Hiram Hasbrouck passed to spirit life, at her home, ten miles from Battle Creek, Mich., at the age of 78 years. She had been a Spiritualist for nearly fifty years. She was loved by all who knew her. She leaves a son and his wife and a number of nephews and nieces to mourn her loss. She desired a Spiritualistic service; her every wish was carried out. The services were conducted by the writer.

MRS. AMANDA COFFMAN.

Passed to spirit life, May 31, 1902, Beryl Warner Chevee, son of Henry and Etta Chevee, aged 16 years. Funeral services at the West Side Spiritualist Church, Columbus, Ohio, June 2, 1902. Young Chevee suffered for years, and when the glad release came, he had no fears, but went calmly and bravely, saying that he would soon return. Funeral services conducted by Frank T. Ripley.

COR.

Mrs. Mary Cummins passed to spirit life from her late residence, Burdette, Pa., June 1, 1902, aged 76 years. Funeral services conducted in Wheeling, by Nellie S. Baade, of Detroit, Mich.

COR.

Passed to spirit life, at San Francisco, Cal., June 2, Mrs. Ellen Voorhees. She was a confirmed Spiritualist and was anxious to join her husband, John Voorhees, who preceded her about two years ago. The funeral services were held at her home, 47 Campbell Park, Chicago, on Sunday, June 8.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Send His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You this Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Father Tom and the Pope,
Or a Night at the Vatican.
Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "potteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the spirits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knew what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachymalchrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Nectar itself, it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his epistolical mouth wid the ouff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. Esoteric Lessons.
An Argument Against Physical Causation.
The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

A NEW CATECHISM,
BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.
This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book of reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and cleanness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND Other Offerings.
BY
EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.
This volume contains a selection of the best poems of this gifted author and storiettes contributed by Clair Tuttle in her charming style. There are 286 pages, with six full-page illustrations, including photogravures of the author and Clair Tuttle. It is bound in blue with aluminum embossing. Many of the poems are especially adapted for recitations.
The Author needs no introduction to the spiritual public. Her songs are among the best in spiritual literature. Epes Sargent said of one of her poems that it was the equal of anything in the language, and that she was the poet of the New Dispensation.
The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."
That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."
Will Carlton: "I have read with great interest."
Sarah Thorpe Thomas, the Humanitarian says: "A most exquisite bouquet * * * * the thoughts echo and re-echo through the deepest recesses of my heart. I have some word of praise for every page."
The author says in the dedication: "To those whose thoughts and longings reach into the unseen Land of Souls, this handful of asphodels, mixed with common flowers, is offered, hoping to give rest and pleasure while waiting at the way stations on the journey thither."

MAN'S AURAL SELF.

BY CHARLES DAWBARN.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIRST.

The Size and Shape of Spirit Man.

It is most important that we keep ever before us the fact that when a mortal and a spirit are in contact neither of them is in normal use of his faculties. The writer claims that as a self-evident fact that will be at once accepted by every student of the inner life. Suppose we turn for a moment to the sixth page, long dedicated to "spirit return" in the good old Banner of Light. Every communication is given through a spirit using mortal lips. Let us listen to the spirit in control.

"I see the spirit of a woman about thirty-five years old, quite dark, dark hair.* * The next is a real old man; short and thick set. His hair is white as snow. * * Here comes a girl about thirteen years old. Blue eyes, brown hair, fair skin—too fair to be healthy. * * Another comes with an air of authority because she was a teacher. * * The next is the dearest old lady about seventy years old. * * Then comes a girl woman who seems to be all alone., etc., etc. Some come back exhibiting physical deformities, and most likely are counted as specially good tests.

These descriptions are taken from one issue of the paper, now lying upon my desk, and absolutely prove to the thinker that the spirit who is talking through medium Eps says what he is told to say, or sees that which is pictured before him by creative will power. There is no assumption or pretence that the spirit of that distorted mortal goes round with a club foot in his new life; or that the old man with white hair wears silvered locks "over there." Such spirit return does not prove that the sweet maiden is still wearing a fair skin—too fair to be healthy. Neither will the school-marm of earth life carry with her through eternity an air of authority. Certain forms and scenes are thus pictured by returning spirits for mortals to learn their lesson, which, for the most part, they have failed to do. In other words, these communications are not evidence in any degree of the shape worn by spirits, any more than they give correct details of any experiences in the new life of these spirit visitors. For, we repeat, both mortal and spirit are in an abnormal condition.

It will here occur to the student that this is only negative evidence, and does not prove that spirits are not shaped like the Homo of earth life. In fact clairvoyant evidence has been positive in assertion that the well-known human form escapes from the mortal body at death. Remembering that the clairvoyant is himself abnormal, and "suggested" by his own normal memories and experiences, we now turn to science, that is to demonstrated facts, and see what they have to tell us as to this question of spirit form.

Our little earth is one of a family of planets under guidance and control of the patriarch sun. These children of the sun are manufactured of the same raw material as their parent, but differ greatly in their density, from solid little Mercury to the outer planets little but congealed vapor. Homo would sink up to his neck at every step he tried to take on the surface of Jupiter. On one planet he would be perhaps three feet high; on another he would become a thirty foot giant. Most certainly, if we try to imagine, as some have done, that our dead friend has become a resident on another planet, he must be wearing a form that could not be recognized if it came back as "spirit return." And that form would be determined for him by the condition of his new surroundings, and might demand very different organs from anything we can conceive. It would most probably wear a shape unknown in earth life. That such must be the case is manifest to every child student of school astronomy who has learned the lesson of the different densities of planets and suns. Having gathered these well-known facts, now let us apply them to the spirit in his new life.

Everything that was of the earth in our old friend is left behind in the casket. The form in its every detail lies there. That is the lesson of anatomy and physiology. Whatever is gone is no longer subject to the conditions of our earth life, save in the case of what are called "earth bound spirits." The spirit held fast to this world by its attractions would necessarily take on such form as those conditions demanded and compelled. Herein the vision of the clairvoyant may picture an actually existing form, because it is yet of the earth, and therefore earthy. But no such conditions can possibly affect or compel the shape worn as a sense expression by a spirit who has left behind the old attraction to earth. Has the reader ever grasped the thought that attraction, as we know it, is born of a globular form, or at least would naturally compel that form in a molecular gathering of units? There is always an inner core or center towards which all molecular particles are drawn, each feeling the influence in proportion to its distance from that center. Every protrusion is but temporary. Take the little amoeba as an illustration. He wants to advance or seize his prey. He manufactures a temporary hand or foot, which as soon as it has completed its service is recalled by the attraction of its own center. And every protrusion, whether we call it wing or hand, or foot, or any special organ, is, like that of the amoeba, just a temporary effect, of a temporary impulse. The question of time has no relation to eternity. The mountain is itself a temporary protrusion on the earth. It is gradually wearing away, and returning to the old level. So the hand and foot, and the irregular shape we call the human form, may be maintained for a few seconds of eternity, very rarely so much as a thousand months, and then as with the amoeba nature compels their disappearance. Such is nature's law of attraction to a common center in every form which we call gravitation. Every form on the planet is really as much a protrusion as the mountain, dominated by and presently recalled to the general level by the mighty force of attraction. So much is an irrefutable argument, demonstrating to the student that the "human form divine," as it is called, can only be temporary, whether its duration count by hours or by eons.

Let us now take another illustration that the manifestation of intelligence is limited and compelled by our earth form. There is a drug called "hasheesh" whose effect is one of marvelous liberation from these limitations, for a brief hour. Quite suddenly, and usually two or three hours after taking the dose, every sense of time and space is emancipated. The room will seem to be a mile across. Each step is as with childhood's seven-leagued boot. Yon tree, a hundred yards away, reveals every leaf in a perfect network of beauty. One's height may be anywhere from twenty feet to a mile. Pictures of life from childhood to old age, and dwelling on every incident in detail, prove to have flashed in a moment of earth time. In fact, for a brief experience there has been almost complete emancipation from the limitations compelled by earth conditions. It is a dangerous experiment and its votaries soon grow out of harmony with mother earth, and become in body but emancipated tremblers.

If such be the effect of a mere drug, those who know the mighty power of mind will understand that the same effect can be achieved by a practiced use of that force. But, in the experience of the writer, a few seconds is all the mortal organ can permit of such mental emancipation before the brain becomes confused, and earth again claims her own. But the lesson is tremendous. Mortal man is the product of an energy that limits far more than it expands. His form is the united product of intelligence, energy and substance, compelled to harmonize with the little planet on which he dwells. He sees, hears, tastes, smells and touches just so far as the planet permits, and no further. And psychically he is still unable to free himself from this servitude. He can make instruments of metal and wood, far freer than himself to travel outward and inward, for his own form must, as a whole, remain in harmony with the planet. He cannot see, or hear, or feel to hasheesh limit because his mortal body cannot endure the strain and remain in harmony with the planet.

We now turn back for a moment to enquire what was taking place under that hasheesh influence? There is no creative power in a drug. Intelligence has simply gained a brief inlook and outlook that was not that of a normal child of earth. There was no more intelligence than before, but the powers of the eye and the ear and the brain had broken loose from the limits imposed by the old form, itself shaped by the planet. It could not last, because the planet absolutely dominates form. The experiment was that of a human amoeba pushing out a new foot for a brief moment. A step is made, and that foot is immediately reabsorbed. The sight of the minute detail in yonder temple, a mile away, is as abnormal as the details of lifelong experience lived in a minute. They must be reduced to the normal, and that quickly, or the form will die and disintegrate.

So our sense limitation in earth life is an effect of our mortal form, itself a planetary limitation. Yet the average believer in spirit return is believing and asking others to believe that this effect continues after the mortal form has been claimed by its units. Surely a more unscientific assumption was never evolved by ignorance. I have claimed that the intelligence we call Homo has an inner center, existing to-day, which is largely independent of earth life. I notice that in the brilliant address just delivered by Prof. Lodge, the scientific president of the S. P. R., he also claims that only part of a man is represented in earth life. We have called that inner center "aural self" to distinguish it from the human mockery pictured under the name of "subjective man." We have seen that under the conditions of its existence it has no shape or form we can express even in the thought of to-day. From its radiating power it is only possible of conception as globular. When death has severed the link binding it to earth we have only our experience of spirit return by which to evolve a conception of the form worn by Homo after he has entirely broken loose from earth attractions and limitations. And a nice mess we have made of it, helped, I frankly acknowledge, by equal ignorance on the part of most of our spirit visitors. These visitors are themselves not only abnormal as spirits, but are quite likely themselves only exhibiting a part of their own full manhood. When they come back it is always to try and realize something of their old selves. The hasheesh eater of earth life cannot talk to us in terms of his extended sense. If he really tries into an asylum he goes, and the next of kin claims the estate, will or no will, when he dies. The spirit is even worse off than the hasheesh eater, for his new experiences are still more abnormal.

The fact that absolutely thrills us with its certainty is that intelligence is dwarfed in its manifestation by the planet, and when released by death it is absurd to suppose that the influence of the planet can continue, save upon dwellers at the threshold. If the spirit homo is upon some other planet the conditions of that world will necessarily compel the new form. If that new home be, as asserted, upon some vast celestial plane then conditions entirely unknown to us may permit intelligence both form and manifestation of which we cannot now dream. We must further remember that anywhere and everywhere intelligence will manifest in a physical form, because every blending of units becomes what we call physical. The only difference between the visible and the invisible to us, the conceivable and inconceivable to our mortal sense is one of vibration.

Some seem to imagine that man has a center, called a soul, which is independent of all these laws. When I was a boy I was given a box, the size of an egg, which proved to have a similar box inside it. Then, to my astonishment, I found another and another till on opening the last and smallest I found a pea. That pea is a good representation of the mysterious something, the core at the very center, which the theologian and many of his heirs, executors and assigns, persist in imagining as the soul of man. Something, they claim, so independent of the laws of nature that it is not even a unit. Yet, illogically, they think of it as a part of Deity, forgetting that every part can be split into a still smaller part. Science has emancipated us from any necessity for imagining a soul center to manhood. Even such a soul would have to be composed of intelligence, substance and energy, nothing more, and no less. The unit is that already, therefore the unit is the only possible soul known to nature. Its form consists of its molecular companionship of units, shaped by planetary conditions. Such companionships are ever changing. The unit alone remains unchanged, and itself without a form our molecular minds can conceive. The same units that manifest in the intelligent ice crystal may just change their rate of movement and we call them water—of which ⅞ of our own bodies are to-day composed. A little further change and the units have passed from recognition by our mortal sense. They are no longer the mere crystal, or the planetary water, but a gaseous compound which will permit intelligence a manifestation such as is faintly suggested by the experiences of the hasheesh eater. There we pause, because intelligence, UNDER THOSE CONDITIONS, cannot clasp hands with the mortal. It must become abnormal; and, like air reduced to water, its form must totally change before it can greet earth man. And the mortal sensitive must for his part experience a change so great that though it leaves his form still visible to our eye it usually leaves it a long step nearer to disintegration. At best there is always something taking place which places the poor sensitive on the very verge of that change. We may call it genius up to a certain point, and beyond that the medical expert labels it insanity. It is intelligence, in either case, still manifesting as best it can through the form of Homo. The intelligence that comes back as spirit return sometimes actually builds up a form which is, of course, planetary in shape. But for the most part it simply vibrates a mortal brain as near to its own limit as possible. If the "return" be from the aural self we call it clairvoyance, clairaudience, and psychometric sensitiveness. If the "return" be from the invisible, where the dead live, then we call its manifestation "control." In either case we have telepathic exchange of thought between one mind and another. But the intelligence thus entering earth life for a visit always wears company clothes, cut to shape and form by tailor earth. The visitor may bubble and glow with poetic imagination, but it must be of the earth, earthy. His spirit tales will take earth form, and wear earth garments because they must. And you can always "suggest" either your aural self or your spirit visitor into an expression of nonsensical belief. In fact you are always "suggesting" him until, at last, he feels himself to be just what you want him to be.

The student reader will now perceive that he and I know nothing, and can guess nothing of the form shape under which a growing intelligence is living and manifesting after death. We can realize that so long as it is dominated by this planet its old form will remain. But just so soon as completely freed from earth life there must be a new form born of new conditions; a form which we have no present means of reducing to pounds and inches, the earth standard. It may or may not have our present monkeyfied limbs and brains. We simply do not know. But, in all probability, intelligence must gain powers of manifestation which would smile at our sense limitations, and outwork a fullness of manhood which will possess not merely a few limited senses but every other extended capacity pictured for us to-day by the wondrous instruments invented and wielded by the scientist. But it is apparent that the form that intelligence must wield will be determined for it by the conditions of that new life, and not be a copy of this. Whereupon I venture to conclude with the prophecy that such spirit form or forms will remain unknown to mortal Homo.

WHAT IS LIFE?

What matters it to me or you,
If wealth and honor be denied?
'Tis all the same when we are through
As death will level earthly pride!
'Twixt king and peasant where's the game?
There's nothing permanent in fame!

This busy world will keep its pace,
And falter not at our decease,
While others come to fill our place,
Likewise "pass on," as years increase;
Our name and place are soon forgot
With all the service we have wrought!

No one is satisfied with life—
'Tis all too short to serve our needs;
Too full of labor, care and strife,
Like garden overrun with weeds!
If this be all, why are we here
To battle on with death so near?

A mystery this life appears,
While hope is whispering "All is well;"
And silencing our doubts and fears
With promises that we shall dwell
In worlds beyond, more bright and fair,
"Nor pain, nor death shall enter there!"

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever is Worthy in Every System.

NUMBER FOUR.

Conceptions of things have been changing. Two thousand years ago a seer looking with prophetic vision down future ages wrote "I saw a new heaven and a new earth." As modern physical science has in an important sense revealed the new earth so has modern Spiritualism come with the revelation of a new heaven. There was a day when our fathers and mothers heard read the story of the four beasts, of the four and twenty elders, of the city with walls of sapphire and ruby and diamond and emerald in the conviction that it was a description of the celestial world. To simple minds gazing from afar there was a great fascination in the vivid imagery of this idealized Oriental city; but as soon as they applied ever so little reason and comparison to scripture they were confronted with the certainty that the book of Revelations was either the ravings of a lunatic or a work of profound symbolism for which they had no certain key. In any case not to be taken except in spots as a direct and lucid exposition of truth. This Oriental concept of heaven destroyed theologians who asserted they were "called of God" and who presumed to speak for him had no other to offer. They confessed that so far as they knew the whole thing was a matter of belief without evidence, that the colossal religious system did not have one demonstrable fact to sustain it. (Of course the basic idea of every hope of immortality springing from irresponsible desire is sound.) Not only did they confess their own utter ignorance but arrogantly said that it was impossible for any one to find out anything and impious to ask about it. They insinuated that the blind fish at the bottom of the sea might comprehend the life of an eagle as much as we the life of a spirit. Now if there is any proposition self-evident it is that one who is wholly ignorant on any subject cannot tell whether another has knowledge or how much. Can one who is ignorant of mathematics tell whether I can multiply eight by nine?

As the dogmatists of Columbus' day affirmed that land or no land beyond the Western Ocean there were such mighty currents sweeping in that direction that no ship could breast them and return with tidings of it, so did the dogmatic theologian of the nineteenth century declare an impassable gulf between mortal and spirit. And teaching this they did not realize until too late that they undermined their own tower of Babel. The effective hold of every spiritual system upon the mind of man rested upon the conviction that spirits can or at least once could communicate with mortals. Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. What a parody and travesty and poor counterfeit of primitive Christianity when they healed, spake in tongues, had visions, prophecies; when "many of the saints arose and appeared," when prison gates were opened; when an angel told Mary about the body of Jesus, etc., etc., etc. What a pretense at honoring Jesus and the Apostles in perfunctorily observing dead forms and repeating cant phrases (which once were not cant). Paul advised "add to your faith knowledge," and these who pretended to honor Paul and were ready to condemn you if you denied Paul's infallibility (which he denied himself), said that knowledge was impossible, and lugubriously repeated on every chance occasion in referring to a departed brother, "he sleeps the sleep that knows no waking."

To such a pass had things come that it was supposed a spirit had neither size, form, color, weight or any quality which would give an idea of his objective existence to us. It was supposed a "thin flame," a star point was the nearest description of his appearance. It was thought in a confused and chaotic way that spirits saw without organs of sight, heard without organs of sound, played upon golden harps where there was no gold or other substance out of which to construct a harp or fingers to twang them. The quality of size had no spiritual significance; a speck of dust was larger than the whole spiritual universe. Space had no spiritual significance, so a spirit could be here now and next moment beyond the Milky Way, where light, travelling at about two hundred thousand miles a second, would take two thousand years to finish. Time had no spiritual significance—one day as a thousand years, and 2,000 its had no sense of the important timely relation of events. Indeed it was more than insinuated that spiritual beings and worlds had no objective existence at all, being only a sort of baseless vaporings of a disembodied imagination (if you can conceive it)—being thus more delusive than lunacy, as the chaotic imaginings of the insane are based upon sensory contact with an objective world, being only disconnected and irregular and out of proportion. Thus a religion "which had a form of godliness but denying the power thereof," like Noah's flood submerged the spiritual worlds until the mind of man had no reasonable concept left to dwell upon as the dove found nowhere to rest her foot. Every rational idea vanished and the spirit world

"Like an unsubstantial pageant faded

ILLINOIS STATE WORK.

Geo. W. Kates Offers Some Remarks.

The statements made by my friend, Dr. Warne, president of the Illinois State Association, may be prompted by a good intent, but he publicly refers to suggestions that I offered by personal letter. Having been in Illinois for a month, I presumed that he would like to know some of the results. Usually the state associations take an interest in our missionary work in their territory. I wrote to Dr. Warne for names and help. He replied that the only help he could give was to make an appeal in The Progressive Thinker, which he cordially did. Such an appeal I had previously made; and no responses came of it.

The business of a state association is to get acquainted with the people and to know where effort can be made. Dr. Warne requested me at the October convention to put some time in Illinois, and I agreed to do so. Why did he not do as Brother Ring did in Texas—prepare the way? Then, the results would have been several auxiliary societies and a financial profit. But, we went into Illinois after some advance notice and with much difficulty filled part of the time, but incurred many lost dates and received but small financial return. Our labor was given willingly and zealously to help the state association, but every locality visited complained that said association was giving no attention to the internal work and hence they would wait for indications of co-operation. To encourage that, I wrote privately to Brother Warne and sent a list of names from my record book, which I can always supply to any state. As public workers we need such addresses to further our work by correspondence. Such lists are not for "tests," as name-giving is now dangerous for mediums to indulge in, as so many good Spiritualists are turned fraud-hunters instead of medium supporters.

I sent a good live list of Illinois names to Brother Warne, but it seems I sent one "dead" one. As my record had not been marked "dead," it goes to show that it was not held for a "test" except to prove my innocence and greenness. I expected that Brother Warne would thank me for the list of active people, instead of sarcastically criticising one "dead" name. No personal acknowledgment of the list was sent to me—but the public is told I sent a tombstone name.

I believe that state associations should have jurisdiction in their territory and all local societies should be their auxiliaries. Desiring that Illinois should have strong support, I urged them to try to get Watseka to transfer from the N. S. A., as said place could have better help than is now given to their local cause. The N. S. A. is not jealous of state associations, but is their friend and helper. The N. S. A. does not charter local societies where a state association holds a charter. But, these state associations must justify their charter and jurisdiction by active effort. Their work lies in the entire state and not in the metropolis of the state only. Illinois Spiritualists are waiting for the state association to send workers into their localities, and not to only want or intend to do so. It is a fertile field and I reiterate that a hundred local auxiliaries can be formed in Illinois by the state association, if proper active effort shall be made—but not immediately; for it takes effort, zeal and money to get such results. Expend these and see what will result! Illinois can become a bright star in the galaxy of states, and the N. S. A. and its missionaries will be glad to help, but must expect the state association and the individual Spiritualists will cooperate and move forward with united strength to the achieving of such good results.

Brother Warne is able to lead and achieve this great victory—and he may be able also to point the way for that national co-operation free of flaws that is so much desired. We are looking for a leader. Such men are born as well as made. When we find the born leaders are demonstrating capacity, our national conventions will elect them as their president, trustees and missionaries. Then we shall hope to see the N. S. A. be perfect and deal so justly that no criticisms will be necessary.

Until then let criticism go on—for by that we shall all grow more perfect.

G. W. KATES.

Dr. Warne Replies.

Brother Kates always takes himself with distressing seriousness when in normal condition. It does not cause wonder that he should measure co-workers and personal friends by the same temperamental characteristic when he is a little heated. He is wholly impervious to the humor of the present situation, and does not see that the laugh is on himself because he recommended rousing to activity the living dead among Illinois Spiritualists by calling for the mortal effort of one already entombed. Evidently he believes the dead past should bury their own dead.

Had Brother Kates' letters all been private the passing breeze would not have been evoked. His first on our work in Illinois was published. I will illustrate its effect by an actual occurrence under my observation. Soon after a hurried recall home from a neighboring state I went to fill an appointment for Sunday evening at one of our most active Chicago societies. The first greeting on its threshold from a loyal and influential worker was: "What do you think of what Kates said about us?" I replied, "I have not seen The Progressive Thinker for three weeks—what did he say?" The answer was, he virtually publishes as a fact that our State Association was neglecting its work by doing little or nothing, to which I said, what does Kates know about the work we are actually doing, or the conditions we face?

The following morning I hunted up the printed letter and found it an open charge against the efficiency of the Illinois State Association, containing not one single word of recognition of an effort made or a duty done by it. Let me suggest that hereafter our doughty brother make inquiry of the official board, or at its executive office, for facts, before he gives false impressions about workers currency among the uninformed. Necessity compels unsalaried workers to carry the cause in our state and much is being done by them at an actual sacrifice. Can Brother Kates only grow great in the public eye by belittling fellow-workers who are his equals in devotion to truth?

I would suggest to the N. S. A. that that kind of missionary work better be omitted in Illinois for the future. A few more kicks from members of the Washington board and they will have to substitute some other target in place of the Spiritualists of Illinois. I challenge Brother Kates to name a single town in this state whose Spiritualists have not been urged to call upon the state board for aid in their local work, and invited to co-operate with the state association.

Brother Kates' letter and list of addresses of May 23, was neither marked private nor confidential and I was so dumb to its personal character that I actually placed it on the files of the state association for my fellow officials' eyes instead of among my individual matters. I am not surprised that the writer should dislike reference to it.

It contains this language: "The people of Illinois will not contribute. They are not interested enough to help Spiritualism. We have but very few friends of our cause in Illinois, so far as we have been able to find. Everywhere there are only few Spiritualists and they are not willing to do very much."

Why did he not say the same thing in his letter to The Progressive Thinker, which was wholly voluntary on his part, instead of proclaiming "that Illinois is ripe for work and is asking that the state association shall send out good speakers and mediums"—"a hundred towns will organize as auxiliaries," etc.

Why did he not say that he reached our state fully two months in advance of the time he fixed for so doing and that he never named previously a definite time for his arrival, the length of his stay, nor the terms on which his services could be had?

If necessity demands I will answer his other points at a future time.

Let me say in closing what a medium, or a layman who is anxious for official position, cannot say, viz.: The indifference to Spiritualism in this state is due in no small part to so-called physical phenomena, which has been the stock in trade of graduates from paraphernalia depots and centers of magic, until disgust with and for them and their corrupting influence has developed in many towns. Physical phenomena and its twin evil of padded platform messages are the most serious incubi our cause carries. We imprison men for a single theft, or hang them for one murder, but apologize seventy times seven times for deliberate dishonesty among mediums. Cease condoning trickery, increase manifestations of the genuine of every possible phase, raise mediumship above the level of a mere money-getting scheme, and respect will be born and truth advanced.

GEO. B. WARNE.
President Ill. S. S. A.

OUR STATE ORGANIZATION.

There is not a single state organization that has done a more efficient work than the one located in Illinois, with Dr. G. B. Warne as president. A disreputable element—the very worst imaginable—actually stole its name and commenced holding meetings, issuing bogus ordination papers, and endorsing mediums who ought to be in the penitentiary. Dr. Warne as the head of the only legal Illinois State Spiritualist Association, waged an unremitting war against this worst of all gangs. The case went into court, and was contested by the opposing gang with all the skill that a cunning lawyer could invent. It was continued from time to time, and after a good deal of delay a trial was forced, and the bogus organization enjoined from using the name of the Illinois State Association of Spiritualists. Had it not been for the unremitting energy and keen sagacity of Dr. Warne, aided by excellent lawyers, this signal victory could not have been won so easily. The reputable Spiritualists of Chicago and the rest of the state know the severe ordeal through which the state organization has passed, and accord to Dr. Warne that honor to which he is justly entitled. The state organization has done all that it is possible to do in behalf of Spiritualism, in view of the fact that the officers receive no salary, and as is well known everywhere Spiritualists generally are slow to contribute for missionary work. Mr. Kates' criticism was uncalled for; in other words, in this particular case he shot at random without any thought as to what he was doing—it being so easy to find fault, he could not resist the temptation, not having anything else to say to fill up a little space.

It is due to Dr. Warne to state that his meetings in this city have proved a great success, financially and otherwise. He raised $60 for the Reed City Home for Mediums. No other state organization has done as well as that. The Doctor makes an ideal presiding officer. He is logical and eloquent as a speaker, and thoroughly in earnest in his efforts to raise Spiritualism in his state to a higher plane.

THE PACIFIC COAST.

Tempering the Wind to the Shorn Lamb.

A cloudless, deep blue sky, and a sunlight whose brilliancy has no flaw, are the basic elements of the day on which I write. Just at this hour, we might think "the wind was tempered to the shorn lamb," as some of the old idealists put it. But there are two things that shake our belief in that story. One is, they do not shear lambs; and the other, that law is tempered to nobody or nothing, save as its opposers shift position in meeting its onward movement. I mean the Divine law.

Yesterday we had showers covering a large part of the State. Where it did not rain it snowed, as it is always likely to do, up in the mountains. In some places ten or twelve inches of snow are said to have covered up the flocks of sheep, and young lambs in the grazing pastures among the mountains, may be that is the way the "wind is tempered." But the herders are afraid the animals will die.

It is unusual, so "they say," to have such atmospheric conditions at this time of the year, but when volcanoes to right of us, volcanoes to left of us; earthquakes in front and earthquakes behind us, volley and thunder, we may really and rationally expect anything in the line of seismatic disturbance. But the law moves on to its accomplishment. It is best for us that we do not get in its way. That is why readiness of wit was given us, that we might adapt ourselves to the otherwise inevitable. But the call of the Fire Witch, Mt. Pelee, could not have been very difficult to obey, nor very agonizing in the obedience. One single inspiration of the heated furnace blast from the volcano's lips and the transition was made.

We often think of the toil and suffering of those who earned the honorable title of "forty-niners." How little do this generation realize that it was further, in '49, from the New England States to Western New York, measured by time, than it is now to the "Golden Gate."

In '55 the Michigan Southern had but just made its connection with Chicago. The original Northwestern was slowly creeping toward the Mississippi river. But in '49 the pioneer, with his canvas-covered prairie schooner, singly and in train, with mules or oxen as motive power, started across the continent to brave dangers by flood and storm; by wild beast and wary Indian foe, who, though not understanding anything of the near causes or future results, was quite sure that the light of the white man's face did not fall upon him, nor his heritage from the Great Spirit, for good.

Notwithstanding all this, thousands made the journey, and their march was like the movement of an army of grasshoppers, irresistible. To-day it is by palace car three and a half days to Chicago, and five days to New York.

It is lucky for California that she was born just when she was, or she would have missed lots of fun, to say nothing of the experience. Her life has never been to any extent monotonous, to say the least. What with Vigilance Committees, Dennis Kearney in the sand lots, and the exclusion of "Ah Sin," many of him, the oven has been kept tolerably warm for any batch of baking that might come along.

The pioneers impressed themselves upon all the basic elements of statehood and common polity. There is a curious thing to the unaccustomed observer, the deep strain of Spanish character noticeable on every hand. They had rather walk than run. Prefer to do to-morrow than to-day. Love their friends and hate their enemies, with the same highbred courtesy.

Amusements are a necessity of life. A holiday and a procession contain the unutterable for them, and well—they all go and dance every set. Now, whether it is a peculiarity of the climate, or whether the Spanish unseen residents force that upon us, I leave for my readers to decide.

In common with the rest of the country, we celebrated Decoration Day and in due form remembered the dead who died that their country might live one and indivisible. We had a creditable procession, made more acceptable by the addition of some of Uncle Samuel's army and navy stationed at the armed camp located at the Presidio. What is it all for? The true heart remembers forever its own dead. There can be nothing stronger nor more potent than love to keep unbroken the lines of memory.

We are to welcome the Mystic Shriners of the world shortly, and then we shall have a procession.

Katheryn Kidder, the spiritually-minded actress, who in spite of her family and friends, has won for herself a large place on the stage, as well as in the hearts of hosts of friends, has been occupying with her own company one of our largest theatres. She has won fame for herself, and we trust its driving mate, fortune, is well in hand.

We are glad to [illegible]ar that the persecution of mediums [illegible]s Angeles has resulted in placi[illegible]piritualism before the law on the same plane with other religious bodies. This gives them a new trial with the benefit of a decision in their favor from the highest court.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

LETTER NUMBER EIGHTEEN.

The medium says: "Professor Denton, if you do not write something more scientific, the readers of The Progressive Thinker will not believe that you are the writing power, but that I am foisting falsehoods upon the public, or that some evil, lying spirit is trying to deceive."

Now, in reply to this, I shall say, that when those who think this have purged themselves from all deception and falsehood, when they cease to think that they know all there is to know, when they begin to think that they may, possibly, be mistaken in some things, they will think less about deceiving spirits and more about wise and good ones. If a man, in his own personality is low, ignorant, debased, vile, deceptive, and lying, there may be occasionally a spirit who will like to be in his company; but this is not the case nearly as often as some may think, for the man will himself deceive and lie. It is not necessary to lay it at the door of a spiritual being. If that which is written is vile and debasing and bears the marks of lying and deception on its face, or within its subject matter, why not say it is the man himself who lies and deceives and not a spirit? Even the deceiving priest, Ambrose, would not have taken the unnecessary trouble of writing through an earthly medium in order to deceive those within the mortal form.

Now the medium says: "Mr. Denton, if you write on scientific subjects, many will say that you have retrograded, that it does not sound like the renowned Denton; that the writing is crude and materialistic and not like the scholarly professor."

In answer to this I will say, that I am not writing through a crude or materialistic medium, but through one who, when I was with you in the flesh, stood before the world as my equal, if not my superior. I, personally, always looked upon him as my superior, for I knew him well, also his father, Professor Franz Petersilea. That Professor Petersilea is not a geologist is true, but how often when I had attended his concerts and witnessed what seemed to me almost superhuman ability, as he rendered some of the grand music of the great masters, have I thought that he was by far my superior; and when I passed by, as I often did, his large and elegant conservatory of music, and thought of his renown, and the splendid reputation he bore as a musician and teacher, if envy could have entered my heart at all, I should have envied him. While I, poor William, as I often thought of myself, had to struggle against all odds to keep afloat. I was trying to give truth to the world before it was ready to receive it—he was giving that to the world which it loved and desired.

He was not then known as a Spiritualist; while I had already thrown down the gauntlet. But he was a much younger man. How little I then thought that I should, some day, choose him as an instrument through whom to give to the world the great and eternal verities that I propose to give. My instrument is not a mean, low, vile one, but the very best that I can find on the earth to-day. He is not a liar or deceiver himself, but an honorable gentleman who always intends to speak the truth. The medium feels my presence and writes that which I wish to say. I thought it necessary to write this preface, for that which I am about to write will strike many as untrue; but the day will surely come, and it is not far distant, when that which I am about to write will be the proven and accepted theory—fact I should, perhaps, have said, concerning the light and heat of the sun. Now there are others who will say, that spiritual beings differ in their opinions as much as mortals do; but I shall not write about my belief or opinion, but shall write that which is here known to be true, proven so beyond all cavil or doubt. There is much on your earth that has been proven to be true beyond all cavil or doubt, and there is more—far more here that cannot be gainsaid. Now one of the great proven facts here, in the spiritual world, is, that the sun is a vast electric light, and not a world similar to your own—that the light and heat of the sun are entirely electrical in their nature; so you perceive that earthly astronomers have not reached all truth yet; there is still more to learn.

Now, some of the very wise ones may say, as they probably will, "Fraud! Nonsense! It is not true."

Well, I can bear it. It won't be the first time, by many thousands, that the world has said that of me. Did not the preachers rise up with one acclaim and call me a blasphemer when I said that Noah and his ark, was a fraud, and proved that a universal deluge was an impossibility? that an ark such as described could no more have held two of each kind of animals that are to be found on the earth, than a baby's playhouse, and that it would have been utterly impossible for Noah and his three sons to have collected them from all parts of the earth, that they had no means of visiting but a very small portion of the earth's surface, that the whole story was a fabrication from beginning to end.

Oh, yes. I know what it is to be called a blasphemer and deceiver, leading men astray from the fold of God. But if God's fold is filled with such baby nonsense as Noah's ark and the universal deluge, it is time they were led astray or out of such a very small fold where such fraudulent nonsense is accepted as truth.

I again assert that the sun is an electrical body; that it is not one body but two; that it is the result that is perceived by those of earth which appears like one body; that neither one nor the other of the real bodies which go to make up the result are perceived by man; that one of these bodies is positive, the other negative; one a magnetic body, the other composed of many elementary substances, mostly metallic in their nature; that this body is dark and black as night, never perceived by man, the other, the magnetic body, is not perceived by man, for magnetism can not be seen; that these two bodies lie at an inconceivable distance apart but exactly opposite each other, that is, exactly opposed to each other; that they both lie entirely beyond, outside of the planets belonging to them; that is, the planets lie inside their orbits; that the magnetic body, as she rolls, is constantly throwing off great waves of magnetism which strike the positive or black metallic body, causing it to throw off great waves of glorious electricity, lighting up in splendor all the planets belonging to them, while the great waves of magnetism, as they flow toward the dark body, also strike the planets in their course. One gives magnetic life, the other electric light and heat. But they are one and cannot be divided. Thus they forever play back and forth, losing nothing, for the magnetic body forever receives the electric rays, gathering them up they are again resolved into magnetism proper and again roll forth in great waves toward the dark body which they strike with the same result.

So when one looks at the sun, one is looking at electrical rays and nothing more, the black body being the focus. Now all this might be written in very learned language, with many technical names and phrases. Whoever desires, may do this if it would please them better, but I am pleased to write it in the manner I have done. It suits me very well. It is facts, thoughts and truth I wish to give, couched in the most simple language, so that even a child may understand.

A blazing body of fire, such as many suppose the sun to be, would be consumed or scattered into ashes, its light would at length go out and that would be an end to its planets.

The theory put forth of late by an astronomical professor is all at fault. He speaks of a blazing atmosphere of volcanic action, sun spots, and so forth, accounting for the great heat wave which passed over a portion of the earth. If such had been the case the intense heat would have been felt in California and other places, but such parts of the earth knew nothing of it. The great heat was felt only in Eastern localities, showing, conclusively, that it had to do with the atmosphere of the earth, and was not due to the action of the sun.

It is not my intention to write long and learnedly, but merely to touch on certain truths that will yet prove of immense importance to the world. I want no especial credit, neither does the medium, simply to put man's mind in the right direction; a sort of switch tender, switching you off on the right track.

Now if I did not know that what I have told you was the truth, I would not have written about it; but I most solemnly aver that I have told you the truth and nothing but the truth, and time will shortly prove it to all men. In fifty years from the present, it will be considered the height of ignorance to say, as you all do now, that the sun is simply one blazing body of light.

Franz Petersilea was the first spirit who was able to control any medium in this direction, that the truth might be given to man; all honor be to his name. Would that you honored him there as we do here. He elaborated this great truth in his book, "The Discovered Country."

And now the medium says: "Mr. Denton, I fear that people will say that you are not the controlling power in this writing because you say the same that Prof. Petersilea did."

Well, I can only say to this, that I am obliged to tell the truth even if some other spirit did write the same truth.

Truth is truth even if forty thousand spirits wrote the same truth. That which is a fact cannot be changed. I could give a great deal of scientific information to the world if it was ready to receive it, but it is useless to waste the time and strength of the medium on that which the world cannot and will not receive; still I may touch on a number of scientific facts before I get through.

Ever for Truth. WILLIAM DENTON.

THE CRUCIFIXION OF JESUS.

The Year and the Day Are Shown to Be Wholly Indeterminable.

In The Progressive Thinker of May 17, D. W. Hull says: "Jesus was slain, if we may credit the biographies given us, on the day before the passover Sabbath." This is true according to the fourth gospel, but not according to the other three.

The Jewish day began at evening, and all four gospels describe the trial and crucifixion of Jesus as occurring on the day before the Sabbath, that is to say, on Friday. But according to Matthew, Mark and Luke that Friday was a passover day. This is incontrovertible. Luke says:

"Now the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the passover. . . . Then came the day of unleavened bread when the passover must be killed. . . . And when the hour was come he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him. And he said unto them, 'With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer.'"

This was Thursday evening, the beginning of the great feast day. After supper Jesus was arrested; his trial began in the early morning, and he died on the cross at the ninth hour, that is to say, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the great passover day.

The fourth gospel contradicts the other three in describing the event as occurring on the day before the passover. The last supper, according to John, was not a paschal feast, but an ordinary meal. There was no breaking of bread or pissing of the cup in remembrance of Jesus. The washing of the disciples' feet on this occasion is told by John only. The dipping of a sop and giving it to Judas is mentioned by John only. And after the trial John distinctly says:

"It was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour; and he (Pilate) saith unto the Jews, 'Behold your king!'"

Again, after the crucifixion, John says:

"The Jews, therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day (for that Sabbath was an high day), besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away."

That ensuing Sabbath became "an high day" because it was also a passover day.

Out of the many irreconcilable discrepancies between the fourth gospel and the other three, this one in regard to the day of crucifixion may be considered the most vital. That the synoptic writers were wrong in describing the event as occurring on the great passover day is proved by the fact that the Jewish law forbade a trial or execution on that holy day, and further, by the fact that the passover was never allowed to fall on Friday. This the writer of the fourth gospel seemed to know, and yet he was apparently not a Jew. From first to last John speaks of the Jews as if he was a born Gentile and a Jew-hater. The word Jew is of rare occurrence in the synoptics, and is never used opprobriously. In the fourth gospel it occurs seventy times and is often used offensively.

In what year did the crucifixion occur? In a compilation of thirty-two different authorities, ancient and modern, fixing the probable year, the guessing is as follows: A. D. 29, six authorities; A. D. 30, seven; A. D. 31, four; A. D. 32, three; A. D. 33, eleven; A. D. 34, none; A. D. 35, one.

The following table indicates the exact hour and minute of the passover full moon in each of the above-named years:

A. D. 29, April 17, Sunday, at 1:31 a. m.
A. D. 30, April 6, Thursday, at 10:22 a. m.
A. D. 31, March 26, Monday, at 7:11 p. m.
A. D. 32, April 12, Saturday, at 4:44 p. m.
A. D. 33, April 2, Thursday, at 1:33 a. m.
A. D. 34, March 22, Monday, at 10:21 a. m.
A. D. 35, April 13, Sunday, at 7:53 a. m.

It will be seen that in none of these years did the passover fall on Friday; and that only in the year 32 did it fall on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, in which case the trial and execution of Jesus might have occurred on Friday, as described by John.

In regard to the earliest authorities, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian of Carthage, say that the crucifixion was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, A. D. 29; and the same year is fixed in the recently discovered Syriac documents, supposed to belong to the fourth century. The testimony of Tertullian, however, is invalidated by his assertion that March 25th was the day of the crucifixion. The full moon of March, A. D. 29, was on the 18th of that month, and the next full moon was April 17th. And March 25th was one day earlier than the passover ever occurred.

Furthermore, I have no doubt that the works of Tertullian and of all the other so-called early fathers were forged by the Benedictine monks after the revival of learning. Nay more, I believe that the whole of the New Testament was fabricated by modern monks.

John the evangelist is the only writer in the New Testament that uses the word "nail." He makes the doubting Thomas say: "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe." The other evangelists say nothing about the skepticism of Thomas, and do not even imply his absence from the first meeting of the disciples after the resurrection. Nor is there anything in the description of the crucifixion given by all four evangelists which implies the use of nails. "Neither the Jews nor any other people," says Voltaire, "ever thought of fixing persons to the cross by nails; there is not a single instance of it; it is a fiction of some painter, built upon a notion completely erroneous." (Phil. Dic. Art. Executioner.)

It is true that King James' translation of Col. ii:14, reads, "nailing it to his cross," but that is an error of the Greek scribe. The Latin Vulgate has affigens illud cruci, "affixing it to the cross;" and it is the same in the so-called ancient Syriac version. Nowhere else in the Pauline epistles is there a word which, in any version, implies nailing.

This passage, therefore, in John's gospel, about the print of the nails, is undoubtedly a modern fabrication; and so also, I believe, is the whole book itself, as well as the other gospels and epistles.

John tells us many things that are nowhere else recorded. He claims to be "the disciple whom Jesus loved," and to whom he commended his mother at the cross, saying, "Woman, behold thy son." The other evangelists say nothing about any women near the cross at the crucifixion. Matthew and Mark say that there were women looking on afar off, among whom were Mary Magdalene, Mary, the mother of James and Joses, and Salome. They do not name or mention the mother of Jesus. And the absence of John himself is implied by Luke who says, "And all his acquaintance, and the women that followed him from Galilee stood afar off beholding these things."

And John's gospel is remarkable for important omissions. Why did he not tell us what became of Jesus? Why did he not discuss the ascension of the Logos into heaven? Surely if any one witnessed that glorious event John did. He tells us what Jesus said to Peter about that apostle's coming decrepitude and death. And when Peter asked about the future of "the disciple whom Jesus loved," the answer recorded by John is: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" "Then went this saying abroad among the brethren," John adds, "that the disciple should not die." Did the writer mean to have us believe that he was to live until the second advent of Jesus and the end of the world?

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Do We Need a Bible, Anyway?

Bro. Hunt, of Santa Barbara, thinks we do, for the reason the Bible we have now is only a human production. Bro. McFarland, of Chicago, thinks the Bible we already have is all-sufficient if we could only succeed in understanding it.

I should like to ask if all the Bibles of all times and all nations are anything more than simply human productions, and, if a Bible which not more than one in a hundred can understand, is of any practical benefit to humanity? Are Bibles anything more than the opinions of men who lived in the age in which they were compiled or written? Did God ever write a book, and if not, are they not all human productions?

But the claim will be made, we need a Bible for moral guidance. This claim might be valid if it could be shown that without a Bible we should have no morality. In view of the fact that man is a progressive being, and that the so-called morals of one age become the grossest immorality of a succeeding age, we may well ask the question, What is morality? The cannibal does not consider it immoral to eat the flesh of his fellow man, while another considers it immoral to eat flesh of any description. Many goody-goody people would lift their hands in holy horror if under the stress of some excitement one should let slip a harmless cuss-word, while at the same time they will not hesitate to blacken a neighbor's character, thus committing far more sin than in an unlimited amount of "cussing." I am not an advocate of using profane language, as it at least is low and vulgar, but between it and bearing false witness and indulging in scandal, the former is the very height of morality.

The good Christian considers it highly immoral and desperately dangerous not to believe in the atoning blood of Jesus Christ, while many Spiritualists and Freethinkers (the writer included) consider the so-called Christian scheme of salvation as the very grossest form of immorality. Is there, under the shining light of the heavens, anything more immoral than the doctrine that man can sin and escape the penalty?

The question of what is right or wrong, of what is moral or immoral, cannot be settled for all time by any book, whether labeled holy or otherwise, but must be settled by the general experiences of humanity.

Any action is right that results in good to ourselves or others, and any action is wrong that results in evil to ourselves or others, and we repeat, this can only be determined by experience and not by a creed or a Bible nor by the opinions of Madam Grundy.

The fact is, morality is not dependent upon churches, creeds or Bibles, but antedates them all and is inherent in the constitution of man himself. There is only one rule of moral action between man and his fellow man, and it lies in a practical appreciation of the principles of the golden rule. For this rule we are not indebted to the Bibles of the world (though it may be incorporated in them). The principle was uttered long before any Bible had an existence. The man who strives to obey its injunction and lives in accordance with the laws of his being as manifested in Nature, is a truly moral man, and a truly moral man is a truly religious man.

Hundreds and thousands who cling to the creeds and Bibles are consummate rascals, are in every sense immoral while being deeply religious after the requirements of orthodox Christianity.

The world is moving on and we should strive to keep up with the procession, using the light and experiences of the present age instead of continually digging in the graves of a dead past. Science is doing more for the betterment of humanity than all the Bibles that ever had an existence, and can we do better than give hearty assent to the motto of The Progressive Thinker, "Science, supplemented by an exalted morality, the Bible of the future." Can we possibly have a better one?

WILL C. HODGE.

Morris Pratt Institute Association Convention.

Members of the Association and Friends of the Cause:—I call your attention again to the annual meeting of the board of directors of the Morris Pratt Institute, to be held the fourth Wednesday of the month, June 25, in the building in Whitewater, Wis.

It has been thought best by the directors to call a convention at this time to convene the 24th. Public meetings will be held on the evenings of the 24th and 25th, the business sessions will be during the day.

H. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., and one of the directors, will be present and address the audiences; also the president of the college, Rev. Moses Hull; Superintendent A. J. Weaver; Hon. Alonzo Thompson, of Neb., and other officers including the Hon. Wm. H. Rogers, of Madison, Wis., vice-president; and J. C. Bump, of Milwaukee, treasurer.

This will be an important meeting and all Spiritualists who can attend should do so and assist in starting this college with a mighty thought wave for success. "In union there is strength." Let us pull together for education. Whitewater is on the Prairie Du Chien division of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Ry. There are excellent hotel accommodations at reasonable rates, and when ten or more buy tickets from the same station they can secure excursion rates, one and one-third fare, provided all come and return at the same time. Get your friends to join you and make a visit to the first convention of the first Spiritualist college in the world.

Yours for a good attendance in the interest of education,

CLARA L. STEWART,
Secretary M. P. I. A.

ONE MORE WORD.

In Re the Charter of the Illinois State Association.

To the Editor:—I thank you for publishing in the last issue of your valuable journal, my reply to Dr. Warne's letter of previous week, on "Some facts needing attention;" kindly allow me another word, in response to the letter of Dr. Warne, which appeared last week, following mine. I make no reply to the matter he mentions concerning the work and action of the N. S. A. board that was in power in February, 1898, as I have no records in this office of any charter ever having been granted to the Illinois State Association, previous to the one I mention in my recent letter, published in The Progressive Thinker, June 14. I wish to reply to Dr. Warne's query, "Aside from the stubs of a blank charter book, should not the minutes of every meeting of the N. S. A. board record so important a thing as to the voting of an auxiliary charter?"

First, in reply to this very reasonable inquiry of our friend, Dr. Warne, I would state, that we have no blank charter book in this office, nor do we issue stubs from such a book. We give an official receipt for the charter fee when paid, and this receipt leaves its stub in the receipt book. But as the Illinois State Association, was not called on to send fee, no such stub book was used in its case. The Illinois charter is copied entire as it was sent from this office—as is the charter of all other societies—this charter book is an immense affair, as its pages represent the printed and written matter on each charter, with lines for all moneys paid to the N. S. A. in the ensuing years after charter is issued. We had this book at the convention in Chicago three years ago, where it could have been inspected by any attendant or delegate. The Illinois State Association is registered in that book as number 224—copied from the charter issued, from the application dated June 1—from the persons whose names I included in my letter of last week. There is no record anywhere in this office that Illinois State was granted a charter previous to this one mentioned—three months after the Watseka society received its charter. Furthermore, I wish to say that all charters are acted on by the board in its meetings.

Since reading Dr. Warne's rejoinder to my letter in the last number of The Progressive Thinker, I have looked up the reports of board meetings of my predecessor from November, 1897, to the month of March, 1898. I find in Mr. Woodbury's reports no mention of Illinois State Association desiring a charter, although Dr. Warne states that at the mass-meeting in February, members of the N. S. A. board at that time assured the convention, or mass-meeting, that Illinois State Association, was a legalized auxiliary to the N. S. A. In the report of Secretary Longley of the meeting of the N. S. A. executive board, of April 1, 1899, President Barrett presiding, I find the following. "In regard to granting a charter to the Illinois State Association, and in issuing the same without the customary fee, in consideration of the valuable service rendered by the Illinois Association at the 1898 mass-meeting in Chicago, a vote was taken and unanimously passed, to so issue said charter, gratis, as soon as the Illinois State Association should make formal application for it."

In due time, the action of this board was communicated to the officials of the Illinois State Association, but not until June 1 was a formal application filled by the officers of that association, and, as before said, this charter was immediately filled and mailed to the secretary of the state association—three months after the Watseka society received its charter—nor has the N. S. A. granted any local charters in the state of Illinois, since its state association had a charter registered here. I would respectfully ask the officials of the Illinois State Association to consult their own charter which they received from this office, as to its date of registration, and its number—this will of course either confirm my statements, or it will not.

The fact is, the board of 1898—nearly all of its members went out at the October election of that year—did not pass on the application for charter from Illinois State, for no reference to any such work is contained in the minutes, nor any statement of receiving any application for such charter appears, and the Illinois State Association did not become an auxiliary body to the N. S. A. until the regular meeting of our executive board, in April, 1899, at which President Barrett presided, in which the matter was decided as heretofore mentioned.

I do not feel, Mr. Editor to recapitulate, the matter is plain to any unprejudiced reader. We have here the ponderous charter book I have mentioned, containing reproduction of each charter issued. Also our office ledger has the account of every chartered society—and our application files have the original application of each society as it came from the hands of those who filled the blank spaces and signed the paper. I cannot see how it is possible to go back on our well attested records, whatever certain members of a former board may have said. This one fact remains, that no charter was issued to, or received by the Illinois State Association, till June 1899, which settles the question concerning the Watseka society. Respectfully submitted,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

Washington, D. C.

Geo. B. Warne's Rejoinder.

Secretary Longley's personal patience and her zeal for the infallibility of the N. S. A. have ended in the revelation of an anomaly. We seldom find a well authenticated case in which a child is over thirteen months old before its parents have any knowledge of its birth, although they were personally present at that event. Yet our good sister asks unprejudiced readers to believe that the N. S. A. had no information of the existence of its auxiliary, the Ill. S. S. A. from the time of its creation, February 22, 1898, down to April 1, 1899. And this she solemnly avers to be fact in spite of the presence on the former date of prominent officers of the N. S. A., the congratulatory announcements of that event in the Spiritualist press close upon its happening, the unexpected prominence given to the Ill. S. S. A. by its beginning of the Mabel Jackman case, October 8, 1898, and her predecessor's notice of September 18, 1898, that the N. S. A. board had granted a charter to the Illinois S. S. A. She offers as proof of her position that the official minutes of the N. S. A. board contain no record of said birth; thus admitting the very charge I made that this Watseka injustice might be due to unbusiness-like methods permitted in the secretary's office at Washington.

Let me remind our sister that if her memory fails her yet, her files of correspondence will show that when her unimpeachable charter book was last in Chicago, the writer of these lines was two thousand miles from that city and outside of the boundaries of the United States, in Old Mexico.

Some months after the mass-meeting of 1898, as president of the state association, I requested its secretary, M. H. McGrath, to take necessary steps to secure the promised charter from the N. S. A. Secretary Woodbury's letter to me in September, 1898, shows that application was granted. The state board was without a secretary for several months. In June 1899, it was foreseen that the Jackman case must be carried into the Cook County Court. In order to guard every point we wrote Washington for our charter and were required to make a new application by the then secretary, Mrs. Longley.

Officers of the N. S. A. promised the state association exclusive jurisdiction in Illinois, in February, 1898, granted them a charter to that effect as early as September, 1898, and yet issued Watseka a local N. S. A. charter as late as March 22, 1899.

The state board ground their teeth at the latter action for obtaining a charter from the N. S. A. was intended by a certain Watseka influence as a rebuke to the former for its action in the Jackman case then pending.

Remember, Sister Longley, Illinois memories well confirmed, may, under some circumstances, outweigh N. S. A. records.

Is Spirit Disembodied?

It is customary to call a spirit a disembodied entity, and to class it as inorganic. If we examne the facts of nature we will see that this is far from the truth. There can not be function without organ, organ without structure, nor structure without form. If we deprive spirit of form and function, where are personality, identity, and conditions of progress to be found? The physical universe is the great outer circle of the electrical force. The sense degree of spirit acts in and from this force. This is the psycho-corporal degree, and answers to our osseous plane of anatomy.

The electrical force is the chemical tie between the two world's, and between man's corporal and ether body. It is the plane of nerve force and corporal function. It binds sun to planet, and soul to body. All physical life lives and vegetates in this plane. It is the king of the great outer circle of matter, and forms the base of ideality through sense impressions. It forms the osseous structure of the spirit body.

The spirit universe is the great inner circle of the magnetic force. It is organized in forms, law, and order, as well as the physical. The rational degree of spirit acts in and from this force. It is the plane of thought and intellectuality. It answers to the muscular plane of our corporal anatomy, and gives the form of the spirit body. This force opens the door to mediumship, and to the many spheres of spirit land. It is the occult key to the unseen universe, and to the mysteries of spirits and their environments. It wings thought from spirit to spirit, from spirit to mortal, and from mortal to mortal. It paints the celestial flowers in colors of beauty, and adorns the angel home in the excelsior of art. It vibrates in the soft radiant light of exquisite loveliness. It indexes character by its quality, and chisels the angel in beauty, or the criminal in deformity.

The ether plane is the inner center of the spirit ego. It is a plane of intuition and inspiration. It answers to our nerve system in physical anatomy, and forms the ether brain of the spirit body. It is the part that is liberated in hypnotism, and is called the sub-conscious mind by occult iconoclast. It acts through the senses of spirit body, and not through those of the corporal body. The corporal mold outlines this spirit body; no artist can improve its form divine, and we are willing to give it spirit life.

OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

. . . OF . . .

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

MARVELS OF HYPNOTISM

It May Be Used for Good, or Perverted to Evil.

The following luminous revelations on the fascinating subject of personal magnetism were the fruit of a conversation with a man who for years has made the science of hypnotism his special study:

I may tell you, at the outset that hypnotism is apt to prove a dangerous power when practiced indiscriminately by inexperienced operators. It is a comparatively easy thing to induce the hypnotic sleep or trance; it is quite another matter, and often very difficult, to restore your subject to consciousness, especially if you are a novice and at all nervous.

I shall always remember a rather startling experience I once had in my early experiments as a student of hypnotism. I then lacked a deal of technical knowledge I now possess concerning the science; but I was very conceited and anxious on every possible occasion to display my hypnotic powers. At a pleasure party one Christmas I offered to entertain the company with a few experiments, and began by sending a young lady into the mesmeric sleep. After asking her some amusing questions and compelling her to do a few grotesque things, I tried to awaken her, but my initial efforts failed and I foolishly lost my self-possession, with the natural result that my trepidation was sympathetically communicated to my subject, who went into violent hysterics, until I seemed to lose all control over her. To make matters worse, a number of persons got excited, came between me and my subject, and further disturbed her by what is called the "cross influence." Finally, I got so alarmed by her condition that I summoned the aid of a professional hypnotist in the neighborhood, who kindly came and set matters right by soothing the subject and restoring her to consciousness. That experiment taught me a much-needed lesson, by which I profited greatly.

As I have just now told you, hypnotism is a perilous power when wrongly applied. This has been proved a thousand times. I dare say it will startle many to hear that the more intellectual class of criminals have utilized the influence on numerous occasions to aid them in the consummation of their sinister schemes. It is not so long since a desperate criminal in Europe committed murder by proxy in this manner, exerting his magnetic power on a woman, whom he then compelled to murder a relative.

In another case a hypnotized youth, the victim of a gang of bank robbers, was induced to enter and rob a continental bank, and so cleverly did he carry out his criminal mission that the gang were wealthier to the tune of $250,000. But the subsequent confession of the medium led to the arrest of the chief culprit, who is now paying the just penalty of his callous crime.

But I must not fail to tell you, as a contrast to the foregoing cases, that the hypnotic science also has its beneficent aspects. It has long been regarded as a valuable aid in the art of healing.

The mystery and mastery of magnetic healing have done much to bless the world, but I believe that the power will accomplish yet greater marvels in the near future.

Several celebrated French physicians have for years practiced the science on their patients, with wonderful results. In cases of insomnia, for example, hypnotism has proved an incalculable boon to distressed patients, inducing sleep when all other methods had failed, and this without any harmful after effects.

Some of the most obstinate cases of hysteria have yielded to the same subtle but effective charm, and there has been no return of the original malady. Neurotic fears and tremors have also been absolutely banished by the same healthful force. But what is even more marvelous, perhaps, is the potent power this force has exercised over people who had become the hopeless and helpless slaves of bad habits. I could give you cases in which the victims of the drink habit have been freed from a slavery worse than death. A new power was put into them which restrained them for good, and they have become new creatures altogether.

Victims of the deadly drug habits have also been saved by the timely aid of medical hypnotism, and I have known cases in which an excessive and harmful passion for smoking has been successfully coped with and controlled by the aid of the hypnotist.

One of the most remarkable of modern cures wrought by magnetic healing was that of a woman who had lost her memory during a bad attack of fever. She could recall nothing whatever of her former life, and had actually forgotten her own name. A professor of hypnotism put her into the mesmeric sleep, during which he commanded her to exercise the faculty which had failed her for so long. The first experiment did not succeed, but the second was distinctly hopeful, for the woman told the hypnotist her name and place of residence. After that period her recovery was rapid and in three months her progress was such as to justify her removal to her own home.

Among many unique experiments I have seen one of the most interesting is that of hypnotizing persons at a distance. In such cases it is essential that the subjects must have already been experimented on by the operator. When a thorough sympathy has thus been established it is wonderful what can be done. The eminent Dr. Braid once sent a hysterical subject a pair of gloves, to which he had communicated the magnetic influence. The patient had no sooner placed the gloves upon her hands than she became calm and subdued, then drowsy; finally she fell into a mesmeric sleep, from which she awoke eight hours later greatly refreshed. I have known cases in which a bottle of water had been magnetized by a powerful hypnotist and sent to a patient fifty miles away. The contents of the bottle were then poured into a tumbler, into which the subject suffering from insomnia placed her hands, the result being a hypnotic slumber lasting ten hours.

There have been at least three well-authenticated cases in which criminals in European prisons have been hypnotized by powerful operators, and whilst under the influence have been compelled to confess the crimes which they have previously disclaimed. By this means a veritable monster in crime was once led to confess to three murders of which he had not even been suspected. —Indianapolis (Ind.) Sentinel.

Apparition in a City Hall.

Utica, N. Y.—A story of an apparition in the City Hall here recently is told by City Treasurer George W. Jones and Deputy Treasurer John J. Bannigan.

The City Treasurer had received a large sum in payment of taxes by mail, and with his assistant remained at the office until 3 a. m. to post up his books. They were at work in the tax office, which is connected with the City Treasurer's office by a door. This was open. There was no light in the adjoining rooms.

Deputy Treasurer Bannigan was at the desk near the door of the darkened room. His attention was suddenly attracted by what seemed to be the figure of a man passing the door. When he looked toward City Treasurer Jones, the puzzled look on the latter's face plainly indicated that he had also seen the apparition.

All the offices were searched, but there was nothing wrong and no intruders could be found. The two men finally came to the conclusion that they were victims of a hallucination, resulting from nervous tension due to overwork.

Mr. Jones recognized in the apparition the likeness of a friend and mentioned the fact to Mr. Bannigan. Later that day Mr. Jones learned that the friend had died about the time the apparition appeared. He had been stricken with apoplexy during the night. Mr. Jones says:

"Mr. Bannigan and I noticed the form pass the door at the same time. Had but one of us seen it, why, I would not have thought so seriously of it.

"The fact that we were both attracted by the vision leads me to believe that there was something more than fancy or imagination. I have never taken any stock in such things and I do not now, but the incident is one which I would like to have explained. Mr. Bannigan and I were both satisfied that there was some one in the darkened office who resembled my friend, who died that night."

To the Editor:—I send you the above for you to give it an insertion in The Progressive Thinker. Being acquainted with the treasurer, Mr. Jones, I called on him, and conversed with him in relation to what he saw. Mr. Jones assured me that he saw distinctly the appearance of his friend, who resided several miles away, and gave the name of that friend to his assistant, who saw the same. The following day he received information that his friend passed from his mortal form at the time he so plainly saw him in his office. There can be no doubt that the disembodied spirit of his friend appeared to Mr. Jones as he firmly believes. This is nothing strange or new at all. Such things are constantly occurring. I saw many such scenes when I resided in San Francisco.

REV. J. N. PORTER.

Drove Blindfolded through Streets.

Blindfolded and free from physical contact, Professor McEwen, the hypnotist and mind reader, at noon to-day drove through the crowded streets of the city, found a book which had been secretly hidden in White's restaurant, drove back to the Auditorium theater, opened the book, and picked out the words "A. D. Parker," on page 285, and which had been previously selected by Mayor Byrne and N. E. Nuzum.

McEwen is said to be the only mind reader in the world who makes his drive free from contact, and he is the inventor and first successful former in drives of this kind with or without contact.

For this morning's performance a committee, consisting of Mayor Byrne, N. E. Nuzum, exalted ruler of the Elks, and Jack Wilmont, was chosen, and these gentlemen occupied seats in the carriage. The start was made shortly before noon, and the hypnotist, blindfolded and standing in the carriage, guided the horses going at a rapid rate of speed through the crowded street with a marvelous skill and dexterity. The police patrol was driven in front of the team by the order of the mayor. Its course, however, was directed by the blindfolded driver, who shouted directions to the team in front.

The course selected by the committee was so arranged that it led the driver twice past the place where the book was hidden, and one of the most remarkable parts of the [illegible]s that when the place was reached McEwen exclaimed: "I ought to stop here, but you are making me go on," and continued until he arrived there the second time. Stopping in front of the restaurant, the mind reader took the mayor's hand in his and rushed into the place, back to the rear, and uncovered the book without any apparent hesitation. Then back to the carriage, and on a dead run to the Auditorium, where he proceeded to find the words before mentioned. When he finished he was nearly exhausted, but stated that he was in good condition.

"The test was perfect," said Mayor Byrne, after it was all over. "It was the most wonderful performance I ever had anything to do with, and I am thoroughly convinced as to the science of mental telepathy and mind reading. The whole thing was absolutely on the square, and no man ever had a fairer test than did Mr. McEwen."—Chronicle, Spokane, Wash.

THE HOUSE BESIDE THE SPRING.

I've tasted of all the licker that a feller ever made,
From champagne, sparklin' glorious, to the circus lemonade;
But nuthin' seemed to equal or so much pleasure bring,
As the milk that mother cooled in the house beside the spring.

I've swallered glowin' grape juice tell I'd fairly thrill;
I've sucked the sweetest essence of many a moonlight still,
But they left a lonesome haukerin,, an' mem'ry'd sort of ring
An' make me think o' mother an' the house beside the spring.

I've even fooled with drinkin' o' this fizzin' soda stuff,
That, seems to me, some feller made fer nuthin' but a bluff;
But when it got to foamin' an' I' dhear the fountain sing,
I'd think 'bout mother coolin' of her milk beside the spring.

THAT "SUBJECTIVE MIND."

An Examination of T. Jay Hudson's Theory in the "Law of Psychic Phenomena."

By D. W. Hull, of Norton, Kansas.

"But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."—1. Cor., 2.14.

The original of this word "natural" is soulical, and means what we would mean by the phrase "material man." It was common in Bible times to refer to a person as a soul; and it was generally distinct from the spirit. Thus we find Paul saying, "I pray God, your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—I Thess., 5:23, Taking the words of Prof. Hudson we should render the passage "The positive mind receiveth not the things of the subjective mind," etc. In a number of places Paul distinguishes them as "the old man" and "the new man," or "the old Adam" and "the new Adam." It is the man who cognizes only by his material senses.

It seems to me that this text demonstrates that the early Christians had considerable knowledge of the manifestations from the world of Spirits. Paul could not have written as he did, if he had not had some experience in spiritual manifestations. It is very certain that even with their Bibles before them Modern Christians have no understanding by which they are enabled to write as Paul wrote. We know now it is hard for modern people who have had no experience in Spiritualism to write intelligently in the dialect of Spiritualists as it was for the ancient Ephraimite to pronounce the word "Shibboleth."

Of late there has grown up considerable discussion as to what time the New Testament was written. It is contended by one party that it was not written before the fifteenth century, and that it was solely the production of monks in the Catholic church. So far as the discussion affects my views, I have little care as to when or by whom it was written, but I feel it incumbent on me nevertheless to say a few words on the subject, and if occasion in the future calls I may argue the matter more in extenso. I do not know that the New Testament was written at the time that its friends claim it was, but I am sure it was not written as late as the 15th century, nor as late as the 5th century. In fact it could not have been written later than the time of Constantine or Eusebius. That it may have received amendments, alterations and additions all along the line since that time till the reformation. I will not deny, though I am uncertain concerning any such revision later than the 5th century. My reasons for moving back to an early date for the production of the books of the New Testament was that some things written in them were beyond the comprehension of the most astute minds of the 15th century, and I find even to-day that it would be impossible for very many theologians to produce such a work—not only from the text that heads this lecture, but from numerous other passages in the book, and I am sorry to say that many very learned Spiritualists are deficient as to an understanding of the spiritual significance of statements in this book. We who have been all these years students of psychic phenomena, well know how difficult it is to explain these phenomena to the comprehension of those in the material, and we well know that it would be impossible with their crude understandings to speak of psychic phenomena truly as it is. How much more difficult it would be if they had never heard of such things, to proceed to tell a straight story consistent with our present observations. Were some man to say as a spirit made Jesus say, "Before Abraham was I am," (John 8:58) people would think about as the Jews did, that he was insane or had a devil. For they never could understand that it was a spirit that lived before Abraham's time who was talking. Neither can our churchmen of this day understand it, which but for their ignorance of psychic manifestations, they could.

If the gospels and epistles had been written in the 15th century we should have expected them to have been written in harmony with the theology of that time, but they were not. Indeed it takes a great amount of explanation and patchwork to get an apology for harmony. There are certain dogmas in the Catholic church which should have been affirmed somewhere in these gospels and epistles. But they are not. The absence of the doctrine of the Atonement is conspicuous in the gospels where it should have been plainly set forth. In the epistle to the Hebrews it is dimly hinted at, and this seems to have been interpolated, as the style of argument is nothing like Paul. (On this I have written more at length in my work on "Christianity before the Apostasy). The Catholic and Protestant views on hell, heaven, the devil, and the unprotestant idea of purgatory, prayers to the saints and transubstantiation, are absent in the New Testament. It is true that they have taken the New Testament demons and made devils of them, and made hell out of hades, but this has been done in perfect contempt of anything like a true rendering.

There are other numerous expressions which fix the time they must have been made not later than the 5th century, and probably earlier than that time. The opening passage in the Gospel of John was clearly Essenian, and could not have been written by a people who were unable to comprehend the occult meaning of that writer. There are some things in John which show it must have been written at a latter date than the second century, and other things which show that it must have been written by a man who, though an astute theologian, had no understanding of the the Hebrew system of theology. There are some things in it that would seem to indicate that it must have been written at the time of the great controversy which was the cause of the calling of the Council of Nice, but these passages were interpolated, as is admitted by all, or nearly all.

There are other expressions in John which would indicate it may have been written by a Hebrew, notwithstanding those which would carry an opposite inference. For illustration, they tell Jesus "Thou art a Samaritan and hast a devil." (John 8:48). Nobody but a Jew could have said these words, and none but a Jew or one who understood the Jewish prejudices could have reported it. If the Jews had been reported as saying you have a bad demon, there would have been no evidence as to what it might have been written. But the allegation was prefixed with the words, "Thou art a Samaritan," as if the charge could not be consistently made unless it was first established that he was a gentile or a semi-gentile. All departed spirits were by the Greeks termed demons. These might be either good or bad. But all gentile spirits, to the Jews, were unconsecrated, because they were the spirits of unconsecrated people, and as all these were called by the Greeks demons, they designated the spirits of the Hebrew people by the term "pneumati hagion," consecrated spirits, translated in the King James version "holy ghost," more to hold the uneducated in awe than for anything else. As the monks of the 16th century did not understand this, they could not have used the term with this apologetic expression. They would have seen the necessity of first asserting that he was a Samaritan before charging him with being controlled by an unconsecrated spirit. This expression could not have been first written later than the year A. D. 70, or the time of the complete subordination of the Jewish people.

It is amusing to observe people attempting to explain the phenomena of Spiritualism by their crude observations. It reminds one of the very wise monkey, who seeing his reflection in the mirror, looked behind it to see the other monkey. Failing to find him, he looked in the mirror again and seeing his reflection a second time, he reached his paw behind the mirror to catch him while he had him in sight. Any discussion of the laws of reflection and refraction would have been lost on him, as any discussion of the laws of psychic phenomena is invariably lost on the wise ones who have settled the matter for themselves that the limits of their information forms the boundaries of all there is to be known.

It is in vain that we undertake to explain the natural laws of psychic phenomena to those who live on the material plane. They have certain senses of seeing, feeling, hearing, tasting and smelling objects and they cannot believe there is anything out of reach of their material senses. To them the imponderable is simply an impossibility, though they are unable to detect the presence of an odor otherwise than by means of their olfactories. Scientific men had dissected the human brain in search of the soul or spirit and had not found it, or any footprints where it could have resided in the human anatomy, a clear evidence that it had never made a home in the human body, and no one had ever detected it in making its escape. It is true they had not been able to dissect and disintegrate the aroma of a rose; neither had they ever discovered any plan by which they could weigh it, so as to carry it off to their laboratories, but their olfactories told them of its presence, and even though it was imponderable and intangible, they were pained to admit its presence and that by some means it was capable of fusing with the atmosphere. It is a strange system of logic that denies the existence of everything that has not been seen by the wise one, but there are a large number of that class of logicians, and a new one is born for every one that dies, and they are all the open and avowed enemies of Modern Spiritualism. They never saw a spirit, therefore there never was one, indeed it was impossible that there should be one. It does not matter what phenomena the cause of which is unknown may have been witnessed, the fact that they have not witnessed it, is evidence sufficient that it has never occurred.

Phenomena, however, are persistent. No matter how much people may doubt, they proceed just the same, and this occult power behind them persists in alleging it is from disincarnated spirits. They, however, know better, because when they manifest they are never present to view. Since the advent of Modern Spiritualism, explanations have been ever shifting, often taking for explanation some science or fact alleged by spirits which hitherto they have denied. Thus they are ever camping on some ground prepared for them by the spirit world and its advocates. When the Hydesville manifestations first came to the world, it was explained that it was the noise of a mouse nibbling, then it was the girls' toe-joints, then it was electricity. But these theories were exploded as fast as they were uttered. Then it was discovered it was the devil, though by so doing, they were opposing the materialistic theory of others of their opponents, who claimed there could be no such thing as an intangible occult spirit, and they never once stopped to question the existence of that mythical being. Soon it was discovered that there was no room for two omnipresent beings in the same universe; that one or the other must be absorbed by the remaining one. Then came the subconscious theory of Prof. Carpenter of England, and it failed to explain. Finally they tried the explanation of mind reading, though they stoutly denied such a possibility, and to now admit that their adversaries, the Spiritualists, were correct when they claimed such a possibility, would be an admission against their material hypothesis, but any explanation was better than none, and though it required a larger stretch of credulity to accept their explanations than to accept the claims of the spirits who produced the phenomena, any explanation which would enable them to get rid of the fact that the spirit world was holding intercourse with the denizens of earth was more than welcomed.

Another explanation is now before the world which I am to examine in this lecture. That is what is called "The Subjective Mind" theory. This theory has been most fully set forth by Prof. Hudson, in two books, one somewhat a repetition of the other, entitled, "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," and "Immortality." His ideas were not new, as Alfred Binet in his "Altered Personalities" had not only established the duality of Mind, but even the triality of mind, as there clearly appeared to be two objective minds, unacquainted with each other. Prof. Hudson's theory is that there are two minds, one objective, the other subjective. The objective mind is that positive element within us that comes in contact with the everyday affairs of life, and the subjective mind is that part of the individual which is subordinated to the objective and seldom manifests except in hypnotism, somnambulism, and occasionally in our dreams. His theory is best stated in his own language as summarized in the following:

THE SUBJECTIVE MIND.

1. The subjective mind is constantly amenable to control by the power of suggestion.
2. It is incapable of independent reasoning by the process of induction.
3. Its power to reason deductively from given premises to correct conclusions is practically perfect.
4. It is endowed with a perfect memory.
5. It is the seat of the emotions.
6. It possesses the power to move ponderable objects without physical contact.
7. It has the power to communicate and receive intelligence otherwise than through the recognized channels of the senses.
8. Its activity and power are inversely proportionate to the vigor and healthfulness of the physical organism.
9. It is endowed with the faculties of instinct and intuition, and, under certain conditions, with the power of intuitive cognition or perception of the laws of nature.

THE OBJECTIVE MIND.

1. The objective is manifestly not controllable by the power of suggestion in the sense in which the subjective mind is so controlled—that is, against reason, experience and the evidence of the senses.
2. It is capable of inductive reasoning.
3. Its power of deductive reasoning is by no means perfect, nor does it approach perfection.
4. Its memory in its best estate, is very defective, and comparatively speaking, amounts to nothing more than an uncertain, evanescent ability to recall a few more prominent ideas and impressions which it has once experienced.
5. It is absolutely destitute of emotion.
6. It cannot exercise the slightest kinetic force beyond the range of physical contact.
7. It is destitute of any power remotely akin to telepathy.
8. The essential prerequisite to the successful exercise of its highest powers and functions is a perfectly sound, healthy normal physical organism.
9. It is endowed with no power which is remotely akin to instinct or intuition.

The following extracts from his book on Immortality will give his further explanation of his theory:

"Mind possesses subjective faculties that perform no normal function in physical life, and objective faculties which can perform no function in spiritual life; the conclusions are necessarily identical; namely, that faculties which perform no normal functions in this life must necessarily belong to the next life."

"The objective mind is the function of the brain, and ceases when the brain dies or is destroyed. The subjective mind on the other hand belongs to an entity which is neither dependent for its existence, nor for the power to perform its functions upon the vitality, or even the existence of the brain."

"All psychic activity is not only abnormal, but it is in the highest degree injurious to the body as well as the mind."

"I have again and again sought to impress upon my readers the pregnant fact that, whenever the subjective mind of man usurps control over the dual mental organism, Reason abdicates her throne; and just in proportion to the completeness and persistency of that control the subject is insane. Not only is this true, but it is a fact, which the experience of everyday life will demonstrate to the mind of the most superficial observer, that many of the nervous diseases to which mankind is subject, and all immorality, vice, crime and insanity are the direct results of abnormal psychic activity and control over the dual mental organism."

"No one who is familiar with the class of psychics known as "mediums" will gainsay the statement that, as a class, they are to the last degree neurotic. If there are exceptions to the rule they are in cases where the psychic powers are of very recent development. It is probably true that perfectly healthy persons may develop psychic powers, although competent physicians are at variance on that point."

I shall not deny that there is a duality of the mind—that there is an objective and subjective mind, or more plainly speaking a positive and a negative mind, one subordinate to the other. Paul had discovered it long ago, (See Rom. 8:1-16). But I shall object to some of his premises. The charges made in the above extracts may be summarized as follows: Mediumship is

1. Destructive of health and life;
2. It leads to insanity;
3. It leads to vice;
4. It leads to crime.

Is this so? Let us see. The same author subordinates the objective and elevates the subjective. Then we should expect the same phenomena in hypnotism that we find in mediumship.

1. Is it destructive of health and life? Every person who has studied hypnotism at all knows that this is not true. Physicians are coming to know that magnetism and hypnotism are the greatest curative agents that have ever been discovered, and many of our ablest physicians, have laid aside their medicine cases entirely, and now visit their patients with nothing in their hands except what nature has given them.

2. Does it lead to insanity? If it does, every means by which the subjective state is produced, also leads to insanity. But I may safely say that he has not a single fact to bear out his assertion. The causes of insanity are various, but the only infallible cure for it is hypnotism, or placing the patient in the subjective state. I use the word infallible in a modified sense, knowing that there may be possible cases that cannot be reached even by hypnotism, and also knowing that sometimes it is not possible to get the attention of the patient long enough to induce the hypnotic state.

In the subjective state the patient is brought to a quiescent state, the objective being subordinated. But in insanity, there is no subjective condition, for the mind is violently active. But all the faculties are not in complete harmony with each other. Prof. Hudson tells us that the subjective mind is not dependent on the brain, whereas in insanity portions of the brain are usually inflamed. The mind being thrown off its balance is the cause of insanity. Insanity is caused by too hard thinking or a strained condition of the nervous system, while hypnotism or the superior condition of the nervous system is caused by the cessation of the thinking faculties and the tranquillity of the nervous system. In 1896 Dr. P. S. George, of Lincoln, Neb., wrote for reports as to the causes of insanity in the various insane asylums in the United States, and the reports indicated that there were only very few Spiritualists in all the insane asylums in the United States. I don't remember the number, but not as many as I have fingers on my hands, and only one or two of them had been made insane by Spiritualism. While there were several score who had been made insane from too severe thinking on religious subjects, other than Spiritualism. About 30 or more years ago, Mrs. Packard and Mrs. Shedd were incarcerated in an Illinois Insane asylum, not because they were insane (as it appeared afterward in a habeas court), but because they had changed their religious views and become Spiritualists. A few years ago, a young man was imprisoned on the charge of insanity in an Ohio insane asylum, but this was at the instance of relatives who wanted to get charge of his property.

It will be noticed that Prof. Hudson gives his bare assertion. He states in a most positive manner that "the experience of every-day life will demonstrate to the mind of the most superficial observer that many of the nervous diseases, to which mankind are subject, and all immorality, vice, crime and insanity, are the direct results of abnormal psychic activity, and control over the dual mental organism!" Of this bold assertion unsupported by a single reference to any fact, and contradicted by every fact referred to in this criticism, I have a little more to say in the conclusion.

3. Does it lead to vice? I have known of a number of persons who have been forced to abandon the drink habit, by becoming mediums, others to give up their tobacco, tea, coffee and pork, but I never heard of a case where these evil habits were induced, and I hereby invite Prof. Hudson and his friends to refer me to one single instance where either of these or any other vice has been induced by mediumship. It should not be a matter of wonder if one or two such should be found, for people go into the spirit world in every condition in life and some of them in returning are likely to bring their old appetites with them, and possibly may influence those with whom they come in contact to the same vices.

4. Does it lead to crime? If it does, why is it that in all the states prisons in all the United States in 1896 there were only two Spiritualists? At the same time there were in these prisons 1,222 Methodists; 1,212 Catholics; 341 Presbyterians; 694 Baptists; 537 Lutherans; 185 Congregationalists; 2905 other denominations. This statement is in contradiction of all the hypnotic writers. For all state with one accord that no person hypnotized or raised to the subjective state can be induced to do anything he would not do in the objective state. This being the case, and the subject in hypnotism being under the influence of the operator who is unable to compel him to do anything in violation of his objective conscience, how is a medium not under the influence of any operator to be induced to crime?

Now let us see where this theory leads its votaries to. We are told above, "Mind possesses subjective faculties that perform no normal function in physical life, and objective faculties which can perform no function in spiritual life; the conclusions are necessary identical; namely, that faculties which perform no functions in this life must necessarily belong to the next life," and then we are told that "All psychic activity is not only abnormal, but it is in the highest degree injurious to the body as well as the mind." Yet it is the psychic or subjective mind that is to continue after the death of the body. In this life it is kept under control by the objective faculties, which "can perform no function in spiritual life." And then that mediums or those whose "subjective mind usurps control" are "insane," and that "all immorality, vice, crime and insanity are the direct results" of those under the control of these psychic faculties! Truly here is a state of things! This subjective mind which escapes death, and has a habit of making people insane and driving them into criminality alone enjoys the distinction of continuing its existence after the death of the body! What a glorious haven of rest that will be to us all, dwelling throughout eternity among myriads of howling, raving maniacs and criminals, ourselves as insane and wicked as the worst of them. To give us the assurance that we shall have the boon of immortality in insane and criminal misery, Prof. Hudson has written and published a goodsized book. After death we cease to be reasoning, thinking, deferential beings, meeting our best friends and those we loved most while on earth, and proceed to tear their immortal limbs apart.

This work is written with a purpose of accounting for spiritual phenomena. Realizing that it must more than account for mere mental phenomena, we are told that "it possesses the power to move ponderable objects without physical contact." This statement was made for the purpose of accounting for physical manifestations. Let us see how well it does that. Now it may possibly be that my subconscious self may move the table, answer intelligently by the tipping of the table my mental questions, as my objective mind cannot answer them, play music on the piano never before heard by any person on earth, draw pictures or project them on canvas, of persons who once lived on the earth plane; but how is it to pick up the body ruled by the objective mind and carry it out of a window forty feet above the earth and bring it into another window. When the subjective can do that, then a man may take himself by the boot-straps and lift himself over the Mississippi river, or even the Atlantic ocean. It may write between two slates where no physical hand could get, but how about laying its head on the coals under the burning grate, as D. D. Home did in the presence of S. C. Hall, the editor of the London Art Journal, and his wife, and Lord Adair and Lord Dunraven and others.

Thus much for the subconscious theory. Had I not run into a covey of men and women who think Prof. Hudson the most inerrant man in the world, that he is absolutely infallible, I should not have taken up the subject.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold. Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lilian Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. FROM INDIA TO THE PLANET MARS.

A MOST REMARKABLE WORK.

Fascinating, Interesting and Instructive.

By Th. Flournoy, Professor of Psychology in the University of Geneva.

"This is an account of the experiments with the 'Geneva Medium,' Helene Smith. In her trances she lives the dual existence of an Indian princess and of an inhabitant of the planet Mars. Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., president of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement. Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds. It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has a full page portrait of the angel heroine, from a spirit painting. Price, $1.00.

Woman's Influence.

The Progressive Thinker felt impelled in its last issue to make some remarks anent Bishop Spalding's utterances concerning the women of America, and their responsibility for three-fourths of the crime, poverty, etc., that exists in our land.

We are glad to note that the press of our country has taken up the matter and very generally taken the bishop to task for his unjust assertions, not to say aspersions.

When one really digs into the heart of the matter, it is found that this thing of covertly blaming the women for the prevalence of vice and crime, under the circumstances, is in parity of equity with blaming a man for the small result of his day's labor at chopping wood or cultivating corn, with his hands securely tied behind his back.

For the fact is that woman disfranchised is bereft of a forceful and mighty element of influence that would give power and effect to her inculcations of truth, right, honor and justice, in the precincts of her home.

Her moral influence would be made immensely more effectual, it would possess, in a moral sense, far greater coercive power, could she back it up with the ballot cast, not by husband, son or brother, but by her own true and faithful hand, in accord with her own moral convictions and ethical intuitions.

When woman votes, herself, by her own hand—and not at second-hand through, perhaps, a drunken husband—she will exercise a direct, and not merely a second-hand influence, and the days of the reign of bar-room bums and pothouse politicians will soon come to an end.

As it is to-day, it is the "influence" of the political shysters that counts, because they have votes; while the influence of the disfranchised woman is nil or a mere bagatelle—amounts, in the estimation of the saloonist politician, to just talk and nothing more. Because she can't vote—can't back up her talk with her ballot, nor will the law allow her to back up her talk Carrie-Nation-like, with a hatchet.

And yet, in the estimation of such men as Bishop Spalding, woman is responsible for the breed of low-down politicians, criminality, indigence, and the moral, social and political ills that curse society!

Not Enough Bibles.

Already there are several Bibles, some of which have no special significance or importance. Of course the "last" Bible supersedes all others in importance and significance, and this time originates in the lively little city, Aurora, Ill. According to the Daily Express, which champions this new venture, it has been reserved to the twentieth century to bring forth a "Scientific Bible," and it has been decreed that a new woman should be the author of it. The old Bible was made by man, its writers, prophets, angels, its Christ and its apostles were all men. In the new Scientific Bible these are all women, and instead of the prose of the old Bible the new is all poetry.

It would be difficult to produce such an article in these days without Aurora having something to do with it. In this case it is an Aurora production, written by an Aurora lady, Miss Mary A. Hunt.

Miss Hunt evidently thinks the times are ripe for a woman's Bible, and that it is her mission to produce it. She has certainly fulfilled her mission as her work shows.

The burden of her song is natural law, man is by nature divine, which is a cause for rejoicing.

Here is a stanza:

"Oh Endless Life! Oh Boundless Love
Within Us! Shout and Sing.
Dark Grave, you have no Victory!
Grim Death, you have no sting!
Arch-Angels see themselves in us,
We in their substance share,
We are in God; God is in us,
Both here and everywhere."

The author evidently thinks her work one of great import, and says of it:

This book will not an hour too late
Nor one too soon appear.
Not out of time—before mature
And appointed to be here."

Miss Hunt is a native of Oswego, which has been the home of many literary lights, and this immortalizes her native place:

"Oswego—Modern Nazareth!
Prairies of Illinois!
Thy soil brought forth a baby girl
From seed of Mary's boy."

We joyfully welcome this Scientific Bible; it certainly fills a long felt want in the mind of the writer, and it will certainly do good, if for no other purpose than starting a fire in the morning with which to cook a wholesome breakfast.

"The Life Booklets." By Ralph Waldo Trine. Three daintily beautiful little books, finely adapted for holiday presents. The titles are, "Character Building by Thought Power," "Every Living Creature," and "The Greatest Thing ever known." The matter is of high-toned spiritual character and of helpful purpose. Price 35 cents each, or $1.00 for the three.

Equality Among Religions.

As set forth in an editorial in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Gov. Taft's mission to Rome will serve to bring to the world's attention in a direct way the new departure which the United States instituted long ago when it decreed an absolute separation between church and state in its own country. The Governor is endeavoring, for the government, to effect a purchase of the lands belonging to the friars in the Philippines, and as they are under the control of the church authorities, he is negotiating with the Catholic dignitaries in Rome on the subject. In this negotiation Gov. Taft bears in mind, as the first article of his instructions from Washington sets forth, that "one of the controlling principles of our government is the complete separation of church and state, with the entire freedom of each from any control or interference with the other. This principle is imperative wherever American jurisdiction extends, and no modification or shading thereof can be a subject of discussion."

The vatican and the world, of course, understand the situation in this country in this respect. Once there was a connection between church and state here, as in the rest of the world. In the early days many of the American colonies were subject to the Church of England. In some of the New England settlements the Congregational church was dominant. But there was a general disestablishment at the time the constitution was framed, and in some of the States the separation began before the close of the revolution. In two of them the separation began before the revolution. One clause of the original constitution of 1787 declares that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." In order to make this principle more emphatic and extended, the first article of the amendments sets forth that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This made separation complete and final.

When the United States over a century ago placed all religions on an absolute equality within its dominions this principle was a new thing in the world. It surprised the lawmakers of Europe, but the idea has stood, and it is making friends elsewhere. There has never, in the whole life of the United States, been the slightest intimation that the people of this country wanted to depart from this principle. The most pernicious feature of the old Mormonism was the theocracy—the coalition of church and state with the church the dominant partner—which was established by that sect. Polygamy, of course, was the tenet of the Mormon faith which was first assailed, but this was because that practice appealed more directly and objectively to the popular imagination and aroused the popular wrath. In the act of 1877, however, the theocratic feature of Mormonism was attacked and overthrown, and as polygamy, according to the statement of the head of the church in 1890, had already been given up, Mormonism then was able to claim the same sort of liberty which was accorded to all other faiths. For this reason Utah was admitted to the Union with the same privileges as the rest of the States. Gov. Taft's mission to Rome does not affect in the slightest degree that century-old American principle that church and state are apart in the American government, and that all sorts of religious faiths are on an equality before the law. The purchase of the friars' lands in the Philippines is a piece of administrative work which everybody who is acquainted with the conditions in the islands believes to be essential to the free development of the archipelago. After the purchase is made that order will be on a complete equality with the rest of the religious societies, as it is now. Neither in the Philippines nor in any other locality subject to United States authority will any religious body or corporation ever gain any right or be limited by any restriction except such as is applied to all of them.

T. Jay Hudson Brought to Book.

The renowned, not to say redoubtable Prof. T. Jay Hunson is the author of several very thoughtful and suggestive volumes which are worthy of careful study. His "Law of Psychic Phenomena" contains probably the best exposition of Suggestion and Suggestive Therapeutics extant, and in this respect may be regarded as especially valuable. This, notwithstanding his assumption of an "objective mind" and a "subjective mind" entirely distinct from each other. As a working hypothesis it answers very well in the explication of hypnotism, suggestion, etc., and may aid to a clear understanding of the subject, whether accepted as the exact truth or not.

His labored attempt through several chapters to demolish Spiritualism, however, will not add to the value of the book in the estimation of intelligent and well-posted Spiritualists who have observed much of the phenomena of Spiritualism, and cannot accept his explanation of the same as covering all the facts.

We will not at this time enter into a discussion of this matter, but will call attention to another point, wherein, in his engerness to overthrow Spiritualism he has apparently failed to note the logical sequence of some of his emphatic utterances.

For instance, he says:

"The objective mind is the function of the brain, and ceases when the brain dies or is destroyed. The subjective mind on the other hand belongs to an entity which is neither dependent for its existence, nor for the power to perform its functions, upon the vitality, or even the existence of the brain."

In another place he says:

"It has been shown that the subjective mind of an individual is constantly controlled by the suggestion of his own objective mind. This is the normal relation of the two minds; and when that control ceases, the person is insane just in proportion to the degree in which the objective mind has abdicated its functions."—Page 197.

Again he says: "Whenever the subjective mind of man usurps control over the dual mental organism, Reason abdicates her throne, and just in proportion to the completeness and persistency of that control the person is insane."

Without quoting further to the same effect, other affirmations in his book, which show that the "objective mind" dies with the physical body, and the "subjective mind" lives on, is in fact the immortal soul—it is sufficient to say that putting Hudson in juxtaposition with himself, if it proves anything, it proves that the spirit world is a vast insane asylum, in which everybody, keepers and all, is insane. There is no mind there except "subjective mind," hence it alone must control, and that, according to Hudson, is insanity.

And as he demonstrates immortality in his other book, this insanity must be endless. Surely not only would "The Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life" of such sort be a sad matter to contemplate, but a demonstration of the impossibility of a future life should be hailed as a rich boon to humanity, instead.

Such is the logical conclusion from Prof. Hudson's affirmations in his "Law of Psychic Phenomena," the result of his over-eagerness to prove that all the psychical phenomena of Spiritualism are the work of the human "subjective mind," without the interposition or help of spirits.

It is a deep pit into which the Professor has stumbled, after having digged it for the Spiritualists.

Important Suggestion.

E. C. Waldron writes from Chelsaning, Mich.: "Why not ask through The Progressive Thinker that all Spiritualists, and as many others as see fit, donate for the next ten years one dollar each, to be paid yearly, for the benefit of the Reed City Home, and pledge themselses to do it unless passing out hinders their doing so. My wife and I will do it and if 5,000 or 10,000 will do so, see what would be in the treasury for the Medium's Home. What a blessing it would be, and there is not a person in the United States but that can give one dollar. See what can be done."

The above is a most excellent suggestion. Every Spiritualist who can, who is actuated by humanitarian feelings, should send the following on a postal card to Dr. A. B. Spinney, Reed City, Michigan:

"Dr. A. B. Spinney—Dear Sir:—I promise to pay to you promptly on the first day of each year, as long as it is possible for me to do so, the sum of ONE DOLLAR, to be used exclusively for the benefit of the Reed City Home for Mediums." (Sign name and full address.)

There should be at least 10,000 Spiritualists in the United States who are actuated by a benevolent spirit. Send in your promise at once.

Our New Premium Book.

I cannot refrain from sending this letter, which is especially for thanking you for this splendid premium book, "Religion of Man," by such an author as Hudson Tuttle. I do not see how it is possible to give such a volume of over 300 pages for 25 cents, post paid. It was nearly seven years that I published the Scandinavian Spiritualist paper, "Nya Tiden," and therefore I am able to fully understand and appreciate the great work you are doing. I earnestly hope that you will meet with the great success you deserve. Respectfully, CARRIE SWENSON, 1211 E 21st st., Minneapolis, Minn.

And he demonstrates immortality in his other book, this insanity must be endless. Surely not only would "The Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life" of such sort be a sad matter to contemplate, but a demonstration of the impossibility of a future life should be hailed as a rich boon to humanity, instead.

Such is the logical conclusion from Prof. Hudson's affirmations in his "Law of Psychic Phenomena," the result of his over-eagerness to prove that all the psychical phenomena of Spiritualism are the work of the human "subjective mind," without the interposition or help of spirits.

It is a deep pit into which the Professor has stumbled, after having digged it for the Spiritualists.

Solid Truth.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox never uttered a greater truth than the following concerning Spiritualism as it is generally understood and accepted:

"Professional Spiritualists, who consult the spirits of the dead for advice on every act of their daily lives, are destroying their own individuality, precisely as would the schoolboy who asked an older person to work out all his examples. If we develop the best, truest, and most unselfish qualities of our natures, we shall gradually be given the foresight and seership necessary to our highest progress in this life. Then, if our dead have any message to give us, they will find means of communication, and if we live absolutely worthy of their association they will come to us oftener than any medium can bring them for the consideration of a dollar."

This does not indicate that our spirit friends cannot come and communicate through a genuine medium, but it does tell the truth, that it would not be necessary for them if we could only draw ourselves into closer rapport with them by our own worthiness. If you do not know how to live worthy and how to know when they do come to you, it would be well to inform yourself by studying some of the excellent literature upon the subject, get the wisdom of those who have traveled the road in advance of you. There are many sincere, honest, yearning souls who have not the faculty of receptivity and perception sufficiently developed to sense the presence of friends in spirit life, and yet of the presence of friends or foes in the form they are at all times conscious. The law is the same in both cases. Those in the form are as much spirit as they will ever be, and project their friendship or hatred, their tendrils of love or fangs of enmity and poison. This law that is operative between mortal and mortal is operative between spirit in the form and spirit out of the form, and spirits in the spirit realm.

There is such a variety of means for communication that mortals need not try to dictate the form of manifestation, as the laws may possibly be better understood by those upon the other side, through which they can return, but try to reach a happy mean in the matter that must be of as much interest to the loved ones arisen as to the ones remaining upon this side.

It is not uncommon for people who are not at all versed in spiritualistic lore, and yet who know there are manifestations, to stiffen their spines in an egotistical fashion and say "I want my spirit friends to come to me, and not have me go to them for communications." These are the very persons who will grumble loudly at not receiving letters from their earthly friends to whom they have not written. You must meet your friends half way and surround yourself with an element worthy of their presence.

"If we develop the best, truest, and most unselfish qualities in our natures" we furnish the means for the near approach of our angel friends whom we so much desire to hear from, because we put aside the grosser and take on the finer, we place the spirit in command of all the forces of our being and enter the realm of spirit and become one with those whom we would meet again. Mrs. Wilcox has given the matter deep consideration. She has spoken well.

Concerning Deceiving Spirits.

It is a not uncommon advisory warning given by well-meaning friends, that we should not have anything to do with spirits, because of the liability of being deceived by them.

That there are deceiving spirits may well be supposed, because of the many flesh-clad deceivers, who pass morally unchanged into spirit life. Those whose hearts and lives were full of deception here, it is but natural to suppose, will continue the habitual role of deception until they shall have become converted from their evil ways to ways and habits of truth and goodness.

So it is well and wise to be on guard, and not take anything on trust, merely because it comes from spirits.

The advice, however, to have nothing to do with spirits, because of liability to deception, might with as much propriety be given in relation to having anything to do with spirits in the flesh; for there is as much deception going on among mortals as there is among those on the "other side." It is from this side that the ranks of deceivers on the other side are recruited.

Therefore to be impartial and consistent, if we will have nothing whatever to do with spirits, for such reason, let us have nothing to do with mortals, for the same reason.

It is obviously impossible to carry the advice into practice in either case, however much one might desire or strive to do so. The deceivers, both spirits and mortals, are around us on every hand, in daily contact with us, and we cannot entirely shut ourselves away from them and their influence.

But we can by proper moral and spiritual cultivation of ourselves, hold them aloof and resist their deceptive intents and purposes. By rightly attuning ourselves we can be free from moral harm, while the deceivers will receive within themselves the evil results of their perverse thoughts and intents.

There are deceiving spirits in the flesh as well as out of it; we cannot wholly avoid contact with the one or the other; but it is within our province to keep our own standard high, our minds, thoughts and intents free from grossness and impurity, so that spirits high and good, whether in the mortal form or immortal, will be attracted to us and environ us with their beneficent influence.

AN INVISIBLE ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

It appears from the Anderson (Ind.) Bulletin of June 10 that a concert given by invisible musicians and invisible instruments would, indeed, be something very extraordinary, but according to the testimony of five reputable witnesses, that is just what occurred at the late home of Robert Keesling, who was buried Sunday in the Mechanicsburg cemetery.

Mr. Keesling, who was 69 years of age at the time of his death, had for many years, expresed the hope that when his time came to pass away that his death might be sudden and painless.

On Friday evening he came in from his work and seated himself in an arm chair in the front porch. His wife prepared the supper, called him. Receiving no response she again called him with the same result. Supposing he had fallen asleep she placed her hand upon his shoulder to arouse him. At that moment she discovered that he was dead. He had died suddenly in his chair. A remarkable and to many persons, an unaccountable phenomenon, occurred on the night following the sudden demise of this man. The witnesses live in and near Mechanicsburg, and are ready to make affidavits as to the truth of their testimony. These five persons were watchers. The remains of the late Robert Keesling were in an adjoining room. It was 9 o'clock in the evening. Suddenly a soft strain of music was heard in the room. Before they could recover from their astonishment the music had increased in volume and filled the room. It was not music produced by human voices but musical instruments, and the witnesses all agree that it was wholly unlike any music that any of them had ever heard. It is described as grand and inspiring. It was a requiem by an invisible orchestra. The news of this remarkable occurrence soon spread all over the section of country about Mechanicsburg. And it has since been the general topic of conversation among the acquaintances of the deceased. The funeral discourse was preached by Dr. Hilligoss of Anderson.

An Eminent Spiritualist Passed to Spirit Life.

The Evening Telegram, of New York, pays a beautiful tribute of respect to George H. Hepworth, whose short sermons have appeared weekly for many years in the New York Herald. It sets forth that it is but the simple truth to say that the sad announcement of the death of Doctor George H. Hepworth will come as a shock to countless thousands on both sides of the Atlantic, who will mourn it as the deep loss of a spiritual comforter and helper.

Varied and valuable as was his life work as minister, author and journalist, its crowning good came in his last sermons. No preacher of our time has spoken to a greater multitude or one that awaited his words with keener interest. More than ten years ago the Herald was impressed with the fact that there was a widespread spiritual want which the pulpit or the religious press did not and could not meet. It was the need of the vast mass of non-churchgoers for that simple, popular, liberal presentation of gospel truth which they did not find to their satisfaction in the average preaching. As nothing human is foreign to the newspaper of to-day, it was felt that this was a work which might well be undertaken by the Sunday Herald, and Doctor Hepworth was chosen to minister to the great international congregation of the Herald's American and European readers.

That the undertaking was most timely and needful, and Doctor Hepworth the man above all others for it, is shown by the extraordinary success that has crowned it. How widely his short sermons, which appeared every Sunday in the Herald here and its European edition, were read and appreciated; how they sustained the strong and brought consolation, hope and cheer to the week, the troubled in spirit and the discouraged, is well known to all who have been helped and comforted by them, and is attested by the full tide of letters from grateful readers that has never ceased to flow into the Herald's New York and Paris offices since their publication began.

The reason of this—and it is a lesson from which the church may well profit—is to be found in the nature of the sermons and their adaptability to the popular want they were intended to meet. As Doctor R. S. MacArthur well says: "They touched millions of hearts in various parts of the world—sweet in spirit, tender in appeal and powerful toward the moral betterment of all readers." They preached the simple Sermon on the Mount—the Golden Rule, the gospel of faith, hope and charity. They reflected the sunshine of Christianity. They put love above fear, hope above despair, rightdoing above dogma, reward above punishment. They taught the kindly brotherhood of man. They led souls to look up to God not as a ruler to be feared, but a heavenly father to be loved, and to see in the great beyond not a place of suffering but a lasting home of happiness.

These rare qualities are familiar to every reader of Doctor Hepworth's sermons. To all his associates and friends, who held him in loving esteem, it is well known that they were the heartfelt expression of his own catholic nature. His sympathies were as broad as humanity. Strong in his own faith, he was tolerant of all who differed from him in belief. His kindly spirit recognized the good in every deed, sect and denomination, and he welcomed sincere efforts in any quarter to make men and women better and happier. Of him it may truly be said that he had malice toward none and charity for all.

His loss will be mourned in two continents, but with the consolation that the world is better for his life and example and that the good he did will be a lasting gain to mankind.

It is a well known fact that Mr. Hepworth was a Spiritualist in its broadest sense, and his sermons taught the sweetest of angel communion. His place on the New York Herald cannot be successfully filled, or occupied by anyone else.

ANGELS OF THE SLUMS.

Meritorious Work That Carries Light and Hope to the Desolate.

REPENTANT WOMAN WON BACK TO RESPECTABILITY AND DECENCY—SWEETNESS AND LIGHT AMID DEGRADATION, POVERTY AND MISERY.

To the Editor:—Down on the "levee," as set forth in the Chicago Chronicle, where poverty, misery, degradation and vice riot together night and day, there is a little life-saving station. It is manned by a good crew and captained by Adjutant H. Anderson of Slum Corps No. 2 of the Salvation Army. There are four other members in the crew, all true and tried, and this little band works day in and day out, month after month, in filth and sin and squalor, relieving the wants of the starving, ministering to the sick, comforting the dying and always pointing the erring to the way of salvation.

This little life-saving station is located up rickety stairs over 48 Polk street, right in the heart of the "levee" district. All around are saloons with their swinging doors, their blinds and their glitter and glare; all around are brothels and dives, and in the near neighborhood there are many tenements where people herd together in filth and misery. But the Salvation Army lassies do not confine their work to that district alone. Wherever there is a cry for help they go, even if it is in the very outer rim of the city; they are always ready and willing, and no cry of distress is unheeded by these earnest and faithful workers.

If a poor, unfortunate woman in the brothel district tires of her life of shame and longs to doff her tinsel and false glitter for modest and decent robes, these blue-uniformed angels of the slums are there to place their arms about the repentant woman and not only pray with her, but help her to straighten up, get work and put behind her the soiled and disgraceful past. These Salvation lassies help the erring to erase the besmeared pages of their lives and begin a new, clean life. After the repentant ones have started on the new way they are still looked after, visited and advised; they are not left alone to fall back into the old vicious habits again.

SAVING THE CHILDREN.

One of the finest features of the slum work carried on down there by Adjutant Anderson and her faithful corps of workers is that of child-saving. The little tots, those yet toddling about, are saved from lives of dirt and disease. A day nursery is maintained where poor mothers may leave their children while they go out to work by the day. These rooms are light and airy and daintily furnished. Baby-jumpers, kindergarten chairs and other paraphernalia for caring for tiny children are scattered about the rooms, and little cots with immaculate coverlets and soft down pillows are placed where the tired babies may take their daily naps.

Each child, as he is brought early in the morning, is put in a cool, clean gingham uniform, so the children are all alike as to outer clothing. Little blue-eyed fellows with yellow hair play about the floor with dark-eyed children with black hair, and the scene is an animated one when the nursery is full. Some of the children are kept there over night when the mothers go out nursing or are employed where they must be away from home over night. Sick children are nursed in the home by the members of the corps, and the children are taught and kept clean and free from the contamination of the streets.

The captain of the corps said: "While we are going about the streets we often find poor girls, often under the influence of liquor, their finery muddy and bedraggled, and we take them in, care for them the best we can and if they will leave the low dives and repent we take them to the rescue home where we give them a chance to reform and become respectable once more.

"There are many very bright women rescued from shame down there. I have seen some glorious cases where girls have been picked up in the street, taken to the home, where they have had clean clothing, wholesome food and kind treatment. I know many who are now respectable, hard-working girls who have sowed their wild oats in the dives and brothels of Chicago. They have been enabled to regain their lost self-respect and begin life over again. They profit greatly by the mistakes they have made in the past.

SOME SEEM TO BE HOPELESS.

"But some of the cases that come to us seem to be hopeless. To all human thinking they are beyond all help, but we trust that God will help us and we try to save even the lowest. There are many who are addicted to morphine and the use of drugs, and when they get that wild and insatiable craving they are uncontrollable and after weeks and perhaps months of struggle to shake off the habits and scenes of the past they fall once more and are worse than before.

"One night last week as I was coming down the street I saw a poor girl staggering along. I thought she was intoxicated, but when I came to her I found she was suffering from epilepsy. I took her to the rooms and we nursed her and cared for her that night. In the morning she was well again, but she would not listen to us. She wanted to go back to her old haunts. We prayed with her and let her go.

"Sometimes the girls send word to us that they want to leave the vicious life and we go to them and do what we can to help them. Many of the girls come to our meetings, are saved and then we take them to the rescue home at once. Many, many fall back again after a time, but we are not discouraged; there are many saved and it is worth the time and the trouble. There is nothing good in the world but doing good, and these poor people down here need us and need sympathy and love, and they need above all else salvation—something to give them hope in their degradation and despair."

POVERTY AND STARVATION.

Some of the places visited by these slum angels are wretched beyond the power of description. Filth, squalor, misery and disease are everywhere. Tenements crowded to suffocation, homes that are but caricatures of such are visited daily. The poorest people are sought out, the ones who need food, comfort and aid. During the past winter many starving people were fed and many sick people cared for and nursed back to life.

The captain related one incident of the winter's work to show the sort of effort put forth. One of the visiting lassies found an old woman living in a hut in one part of the city. She was about sixty years of age and feeble. She lived in one room without a stove and slept on a pile of straw in one corner. She was found in almost a starving condition, her only food being crusts and such other waste matter her little son was able to beg from the back doors of restaurants. She had no one to support her or care for her, as her older son had died some time before, leaving her destitute.

A German family on Wabash avenue was also rescued from abject poverty. The husband fell ill and his large family was on the verge of starvation when one of the lassies called there. She at once brought food and money and the family were tided over the worst of the trouble and helped until the husband could go to work again.

The captain of the corps cared for an old helpless colored woman near the quarters of the army for six weeks. She carried coal up the stairs for the old woman, took her food twice and three times a day and nursed her as though she were a near relative. An Arabian woman in the same district who had no relatives but one little girl was also aided during the winter and saved from death from disease and starvation. The cases of that sort were many.

WORK IS DONE QUIETLY.

These women who have devoted their lives to the poor and suffering do their work quietly and unostentatiously. They go about day after day with no heralding of trumpets and get thanks sometimes and sometimes get abuse. Some of the people are grateful for the good done them and others turn away thankless and morose. Hardened ones take the aid proffered as a matter of course and selfishly take what comes without gratitude or appreciation. Some are won to better lives and to higher living by the deeds of kindness.

The workers go about in a costume fitted to the surroundings. They wear neat blue calico blouses and skirts made severely plain. About their shoulders they wear little dark colored shawls and on their heads black slouch hats. When in costume they look for all the world like any other of the many women who walk about in the slum districts.

Said Adjutant Anderson: "We dress as nearly like the people with whom we meet daily as possible. We do not want to look differently from them. We are down there to help them and we want them to feel that we all belong to the great human family. Our uniforms are not conspicuous and we go about in them safely and confidently. We are of the people and want to be in touch with them."

Adjutant Anderson, by the way, has been eminently successful in slum work. Her life has been devoted to that work for some years and while she was stationed in St. Louis she accomplished great good. Her effort in Chicago has commended itself to the officers of the Salvation Army and she is doing a great and good work in her present position.

Thrown in contact as they are daily with the vilest side of humanity, jostled against sin and shame and degradation at every turn, the women of the army still retain their sweetness, their hopefulness and their optimism. They look out with clean, bright, sweet faces on life and their very presence is a rebuke to shame and to much that they encounter in their travels about the slums.

COMFORT FOR THE DYING.

During their visitation they find many who are severing earth ties, poor invalids in cooped up and close quarters who simply wait for death to release them. To these the Salvation Army lassies are especially tender. They bring comfort and cheer. They pray by the bedsides and carry medicine and food and delicacies. In the last hours they comfort the mourning ones left behind and in every way minister to the tired and the afflicted.

The rooms of the members of the corps are immaculately clean. The floors are painted and the windows are curtained with white, and everything suggests purity and cleanliness of life and character. Mottoes hang on the walls and pictures of Salvation Army workers also adorn the neatly papered rooms. Light and sweetness are sought after in every way, shape and manner. The rooms are bright spots in an almost impenetrable gloom, oases in the desert of poverty and unfortunateness.

Here we have an illustration of noble humanitarianism. Without compensation, they toil unceasingly to redeem from sin and misery, the poor, the degraded and those suffering from the infirmities of life. Their work tells favorably, too, though supplemented with a religious belief founded on ignorance and superstition. It would be far better, however, to have all humanitarian work supplemented with a religion absolutely true, like that presented by Spiritualism, instead of relying on the teachings of the past as recorded in the Bible. But a change for the better can only be made gradually. If the vilest of superstition results in inspiring a class of people with the necessity of doing humanitarian work and relieving the suffering of the unfortunate and in a measure weaning them of their wicked ways, then certainly it has that one redeeming trait. If the fear of a hell and the Devil makes a person better, so much is gained. If the "love" of Jesus makes one a saint, who otherwise would be a fiend, the result is certainly good. Where a person requires a prop to be good, just so far the various creeds work beneficially, and I have no particular fault to find therewith. Spiritualists should, as far as possible, engage in humanitarian work. The creed of the Salvation Army is detestable, but its humanitarian work, its feeding the hungry, clothing the poverty stricken and relieving the suffering wherever possible, is commendable from every point of view, and worthy of being imitated by every Spiritualist. All honor, then, to the Angels of the Slums!

SPIRITUALIST.

Kansas State Convention.

The Kansas State Association held its first annual convention in Topeka, June 7, 8 and 9.

There was a fair attendance of members from the state, but Topeka turned out a large contingent.

The exercises were very interesting and the business transacted was thorough. Good work was accomplished and a promise of progress is assured.

The attendance at the public meetings was good; but the large hall was crowded Sunday evening when G. W. Kates gave a splendid address upon "The Effect of Spiritualism Upon the World's Progress." Mrs. Kates gave some startling evidence of her psychic power to "discern spirits." Mrs. Inez Wagner and Mrs. E. S. Bledsoe also gave accurate spirit messages. Able lectures were given by Mrs. Z. B. Kates, A. S. Bledsoe, Judge H. H. Benson and D. W. Hull. The officers elected for the second fiscal year resulted in the selection of an able board of trustees, with A. S. Bledsoe, president; H. H. Benson, vice-president; A. Markley, treasurer; Mrs. M. M. Wilcox, secretary.

Mr. and Mrs. Bledsoe expect to visit every possible locality in Kansas and assist the organized effort that can now be assured as promising success.

The Absurdities of Theosophy Demonstrated.

THE CARDINAL PRINCIPLES OF THEOSOPHY COMPREHENSIVELY EXPLAINED BY TWO THOUGHTFUL MINDS—HON. R. A. DAGUE, A CALIFORNIAN, AND DR. J. M. PEEBLES FURNISH SUCH INFORMATION ON THE SUBJECT AS WILL GREATLY INTEREST SPIRITUALISTS.

To the Editor:—In your issue of May 31, I find an article from the pen of F. A. Bruce, Theosophist, copied by you from the Indianapolis Sentinel. His subject is Ghosts. He admits there are ghosts, which he calls "bhutas," but "they have no intelligence." There are no genuine spirit manifestations, according to Bruce. All phenomena called spiritual are produced by a "senseless but energetic energy" which at death left the physical body of some animal or human and will soon rot and be again absorbed by nature. Using his own words he says:

"Of course the ghost is merely an aggregate energy and etheric matter. It is senseless, having no mind, and is automatic in its action. * * * Trooping around us, invisible to ordinary eyes, are myriads of these senseless bhutas responding to our passions, our loves, fears, hates, and thus receiving from us the impulse to re-enact the dramas, the tragedies and even the charities which are a part of their memories. These bhutas are the "spirits" which are called up in the seance rooms and which produce the little bits of true manifestation found there.

"Swarming in the lower strata of the etheric atmosphere of our globe are a class of "lives" which are ever seeking to enter the bodies of men. These are the disease-bringers, the "destroyers," the "larvae" produced by the brutality of man. These "larvae" are the grave-worms of the etheric graveyard where the bhutas slowly decay. They are generated from the etheric bodies as grave-worms are generated from bodies of clay. They infest the bhutas which are in process of disintegration on the etheric (astral) plane and use them as the means to reach physical man. Attend the seance. Call up your departed friend. It comes, a half-rotted, larvae-covered thing. It respond to your impulses automatically, because old memories are aroused and repeated. It drifts near you. A small pimple on your cheek filled with prurient matter attracts the larvae. It fastens upon you. Henceforth you are shadowed by this loathsome thing and you wonder why you feel sick."

If Mr. Bruce is correct in his theory, Spiritualists should lose no time in abandoning their "delusions." They should make haste to join the church, flee to Theosophy, or take to the woods.

But before the undersigned becomes panic-stricken, he desires to ask Mr. Bruce a few questions and make a few remarks.

Is his theory of death, ghosts and Spiritualism based on fact or on speculation? If on fact, how did he gain a knowledge of the facts? If on theory or by guessing, does he suppose that people will accept his unsupported assertions against the testimony of the ancient prophets, and Jesus, and Paul, and St. James, and John, and Luther, and Swedenborg, and Wesley, and Andrew Jackson Davis and thousands of scientists, statesmen, clergymen, philosophers, besides other thousands of good repute who say they see with clairvoyant eye and hear with clairaudient ear their departed friends?

Against all this array of evidence Mr. Bruce gives us his mere opinion, and says Theosophists hold to similar views.

Well, let us briefly consider Theosophy which he calls the "Wisdom Religion." Theosophy teaches that man came out of Nirvana, or from a condition of perfection and unalloyed bliss. He had no personal or conscious existence. God then planned to start him on a journey as an individual intelligence, and subject him for eons of centuries to all the misery, sorrow, suffering and crime that Infinite Intelligence could conceive of. He is doomed to be born and to die unnumbered billions of times; he must commit every known and unknown crime, suffer all conceivable torture and inflict like pain on his fellow-man, and, after he has suffered all and made others suffer to the fullest measure, then at some far distant period he will be swallowed up again in Nirvana, lose his personality and end where he began.

God has a great school through which he is pushing his children, not for their happiness but for his own amusement. This must be so, because he permits them to realize their own existence in material bodies only where the pain and sorrow outweighs the pleasure. After they have suffered all—have had all the experience the physical universe can furnish, their God extinguishes their personality.

God has but one department in his school in which his children can gain knowledge and that is the physical department.

No progress can be made in the spirit world or Devachan. The ego or individual spirit can learn nothing except when inhabiting a physical body, hence he has to be reincarnated almost an infinite number of times to gain knowledge. God severely punishes his children in one incarnation for wrongful acts committed in previous physical bodies, but for reasons the justice of which is not apparent, he takes away their theory of those actions; thus they are liable to be reincarnated a thousand times to be punished a thousand times for the same offenses.

If we could remember the particular sins we committed the other time we were on earth we would be apt to avoid repeating them.

No, we don't remember, but that is not a good excuse with God according to Theosophy.

I have never known but one Theosophist who remembered a former existence. That man claimed he was the great Pharaoh who built the pyramids of Egypt, but when asked to explain the process of their construction he suddenly remembered he had an engagement elsewhere.

I have never known a Theosophist who did not claim that in his last appearance on earth prior to this, he was a king or great general, or was Moses, or Elijah, or Homer, or some one of the distinguished personages. I have never seen a Theosophist who had even been a thief or a slave, or even a common fellow.

Theosophists deplore the ignorance of Spiritualists for believing that there have ever been any genuine spirit manifestations. Spirits, they say, cannot come back except to enter the body of some babe about to be born. Only the "shells" or "animal essence come, and these have no more intelligence than the ghosts of dogs or rattlesnakes; and yet they ask us to believe that some old hermit whom they call an "adept," who lives in a cave in the mountains of India, can dematerialize his body, swish himself out of sight, and, quick as a flash, reform his body and promenade the streets of London or New York.

In vain have reliable travelers, able and trustworthy men who are familiar with all the supposed haunts of these "masters," exposed this fallacy and shown conclusively that there are no such persons living there. In vain have William Emmette Coleman and others exposed the inwardness of the Blavatsky delusion, and the unreliability of that Theosophical high priestess. The reincarnation writers go on reiterating the old and oft-exploded story and flood the country with their guesses. They theorize, they assert, they guess, they prove nothing.

Spiritualists theorize also. They say man survives the change called death; that he retains a conscious existence beyond the grave; that he can, under proper conditions, communicate his thoughts to mortals; and they back up their theory by the testimony of thousands and tens of thousands of reliable witnesses.

There are hundreds of truthful mediums who heal the sick by laying on of hands. Prattling children are entranced and deliver poems and discourses that would do credit to the most gifted poets and statesmen. Writing in French, German, English, Swedish, Danish, Chinese and other languages come on clean slates suspended over the heads of an audience, or while the slate is held in the hands of the investigator, precluding all possibility of deceptions. Often these communications are of a high order.

Thousands testify that they have heard independent voices conveying loving messages, proffering advice and comfort to the afflicted or despondent; true prophecies have been made; soul-inspiring music heard; and clairvoyants in every civilized country on earth testify by the thousands that they clearly see their departed loved ones.

I ask Mr. Bruce, are all these marvelous things performed and produced by "grave worms?"

Must I cast aside as a delusion and a lie the story of Samuel and the medium of Endor? Shall I believe that Peter, James and John were deluded when they thought they saw the spirits of Moses and Elias? Shall I say there were no angels who announced the birth of Jesus? Must I believe that Jesus himself held no converse with angelic personages and that Paul heard no spirit voice? Shall I reject as fables the testimony of hundreds of thousands of intelligent people, and account for all the glorious spirit manifestations of all the ages, on the hypothesis that it was "half-rattled larvae and wriggling grave worms of the etheric grave-yards" that produced the phenomena? Must I refrain from sitting in a holy silence in a seance with my family or friends and from inviting the presence of my dear departed mother, wife or child, if I happen to have a "pimple on my chin?"

Now I admit that Theosophy champions some grand doctrines, such as universal brotherhood, still it has no monopoly of that. Brotherhood is a cardinal principle of Odd Fellowship, Masonry, the Labor unions, etc. Its theory of reincarnation appears to me to be illogical, devoid of justice, and calculated to dampen hope, destroy aspiration for better things, and cause a deep sadness to settle down upon those who have anticipated with joy the time when they would meet and greet the loved ones who have crossed the mystic river. The Theosophical mother cannot hope to again meet her child that was taken from her. Friend shall not meet friend, for those who have gone on before have either been born back into this world or are in a condition in which they cannot be recognized, having been prepared to again enter baby bodies. Friend shall miss friend to all eternity, or till that time when both will lose their individuality.

Theosophy is a theory—is guess-work pure and simple, and to my way of thinking very bad guessing at best. If, as it teaches, every soul has in the past from compulsion experienced all possible suffering, or will be compelled to experience it in this or some future existence in a physical body; that he cannot gain Nirvana and lose his individuality and win annihilation until he has experienced all suffering, then according to that logic, no person should put forth his hand to restrain the tyrant, the rape-fiend or the murderer, because the intended victim must suffer this torture in "order to gain needed experience;" and he who would prevent a man, woman or child, from getting the necessary experience only delays the victims in their journey to personal extinction, Nirvana and bliss.

If Theosophy is true, what a stupendous farce Infinite Wisdom is carrying on! How defective is God's school, in that he has no way of educating his children except during the time they occupy physical bodies! How cruel he is to punish a child a thousand times for an offense, and after each punishment take away all memory of the transgression for which he was punished. How deceptive he must be to let loose myriads of "larvae and senseless bhutas" upon us, which, while pretending to be loving spirit friends, are in fact "grave worms" prowling about seeking to bore into us if we have any boils or pimples, while we poor helpless victims of a relentless fate think we are communicating with our loved ones or with exalted intelligences of the angelic realms!

Theosophy may be as claimed, the "Wisdom Religion," and Brother Bruce may be its true prophet, but I am not yet fully convinced of it.

THEOSOPHY VERSUS SPIRITUALISM.

To the Editor—Sir:—Now on my fourth journey around the world, and being connected with the International Press; a correspondent for several American newspapers; and, further, being for many years a student at the shrine of the occult, I beg for a little space in your ably conducted journal [The Otago Daily Times, New Zealand], referring mostly to the report of a lecture by Mr. Maurais appearing in one of your late issues, and dealing quite freely with Spiritualists and Spiritualism.

Permit me to premise by stating that I had for several years a sanatorium in San Diego, California, and from which I could look across the bay to Point Loma, where the American Theosophists have been putting up large buildings in the interests of the Theosophic cult, one of which is to be devoted to the revival of the ancient mysteries as taught by the Indian sages, otherwise the Mahatmas. I was present at the laying of the corner-stone of this structure. These Wm. Q. Judge-Tingley Theosophists profess to be the real true Theosophists, regarding the Olcott-Besant Theosophists as secessionists; Colonel Olcott "running away from New York," they say, where "Theosophy was making little or no progress, and settling in Bombay; and later, with Madame Blavatsky, moving on to Adyar, India, making this place the head-centre of Theosophy. Since Wm. Q. Judge's death Mrs. Catherine Tingley has been at the head of the majority of the American Theosophists. Each party claims to be the genuine. There has also been a seceding from the secessionists, in which Hargreaves and Dr. Buck were conspicuous; so that there are three distinct kinds of Theosophists in California, New York, and Europe, extending eastward to Sydney, and to talk of "brotherhood" among these Theosophists in the best sense of that word is to talk in the keenest irony. The charges of fraudulent mahatma communications, the criminations and recriminations among certain of these schools of Theosophists in America are so pitiable that the puzzled student is continually asking, "What is Theosophy, and are these its legitimate fruits?" Twice did I come to the defense of Colonel Olcott (a personal friend of mine) in the San Diego press. These several kinds of Theosophists vary vastly more in their doctrines and methods, including the "inner circle," than the better class of Theosophists differ from our cultured Spiritualists.

Spiritualism and spiritism are not synonyms; they should never be used interchangeably. No scholar would confound office and official; then why spirit and spiritual, or spiritism and Spiritualism? Suffixes are modifiers. There is much under the name of spiritism that I do not endorse. Its large promiscuous seances, for fun, for curiosity, and business transactions, are deplorable. All such promiscuity for self-gratification pertains to the Tartarean regions. These is also at times downright fraud; but fraud is no more Spiritualism than noise is music, or counterfeit coin pure gold.

Spiritualism, centering in absolute spirit, not only demonstrates a future conscious life, not only teaches the certainty of just punishment in the line of cause and effect, the necessity of a pure, righteous, Christlike life, the beauty and uplifting power of prayer and holiness of heart, but it encourages "peace on earth and good-will towards men," it teaches universal brotherhood, comforts the sick and brushes away the tears from the mourner's eyes.

I met the Tingley crusading Theosophists in Sydney a few years ago, and had a sharp controversy with one of their leaders. In the past I lectured more or less for these different schools of Theosophy, as I did for the metaphysicians, the vegetarians, and the Unitarians; yet, with me, Spiritualism rooted in God, who, as Jesus said, "is Spirit," infinite and immutable, enwraps and overshadows all that has been absolutely demonstrated under the name of Theosophy, including its various cults, ancient and modern. Indeed, Spiritualism is the original religion. It is founded upon the divinity in man. All the old religions of the Orient were built upon spiritual phenomena adapted to the spiritual consciousness and constitution of man, during the era of those remote dispensations.

Mr. Maurais, referring to the "chasm" between Theosophists and Spiritualists, says: "The former (the Indian sages) struck away all those things that the latter (Spiritualists) cherish; the continuing personality, the eternal heaven, and .... even the thing that men call love had to go."

If this be true, that the conscious "personality" has to be stricken out, and that the "thing that men call love has to go," then good-bye to such theosophy for thinkers; for, strike out a man's personality, which implies consciousness, intelligence, and purpose, and strike out his "love," which is a divine soul-emotion, and he is little more than a stick or a stone, ultimating into the non-consciousness of unconditioned impersonality, which would be the rankest old-time Buddhism.

Allow me, not for controversy, but for instruction, to make the following inquiries of our New Zealand Theosophists, hoping for answers, not in words of the dead Sanskrit, but in some of the 115,000 English-dictionary words, used by Shakspeare, Carlyle, Emerson, and others of the acknowledged literati. Further, as I regularly attend the Theosophical meetings, Sunday evenings, I shall expect the following questions answered from the platform Sunday evening next:

1. Wherein do you consider the physical mediumship of Madame Blavatsky unlike the mediumship of thousands of spiritual sensitives called mediums; and do you consider the precipitations and communications received by William Q. Judge, of New York, coming professedly from the mahatmas, to have been genuine or fraudulent?

2. What positive proofs have you that any mahatmas were ever seen except the bare assertions of two or three persons, one an American and another a Hindoo; and wherein does a mahatma differ from a pure and exalted spirit, such as Andrew Jackson Davis, Hudson Tuttle, W. Stainton Moses, M. A. (Oxon), the distinguished Judge Edmonds, of New York, and others conversed with for years?

3. Are there any women mahatmas, and, if so, have they been seen and described as clairvoyant Spiritualists see, cognize, and describe their mothers, and other loved ones peopling the higher heavenly spheres of existence?

4. If original man evolved from the animal, were it ape or orang, did he have to be reincarnated or repotted into a fleshly body to work out some of his brutish Karma?

5. Where were the mahatmas when this planet, according to scientists, was wrapped in a rolling liquid mass of fiery fluid?

6. If kings and queens are reincarnated in accordance with Hindu transmigration, may not—must not—thieves and murderers be also, and may they not grow worse and worse during each reincarnation into the flesh?

7. I have been told by clairvoyant Theosophists and two or three spiritists that I lived on the banks of the Ganges 16,000 years ago and was the earthly father of Mrs. Abby Gould, a writer and poet in Illinois, U. S. A.; that later I was the Greek Herodotus, the traveler and father of history; and again, that I was a priest in a temple of Osiris when the Great Pyramid was being built; and later still, I have been informed that I was, in my previous reincarnation, Peter the Hermit. Now, then, admitting all these reincarnations to have been true, what benefit are they to me or anyone else, providing I have not the slightest recollection of any past life in the human body?

8. If India has been blessed with the mahatmas, with the sacred books of the East, and the teachings of the masters for long, weary centuries, how do you account for the degeneration of India until it is to-day the stupidest, poorest, and most superstitious country of the world, or was such till Western science and enterprise began to arouse it from its deadly torpor?

9. Are Theosophists, saying nothing of the "planetary chains," the "seven soul-sheathings," the "shells," "elementals," Irish "fairies," and other theories and speculations, engaged in any of the great practical reforms of the times, such as a moral crusade against smoking, intemperance, gluttony, Indian castes, child-marriages, and other demoralizing habits and blighting institutions? It is character, so it seems to me, that saves, and not undemonstrable theories and wild, extravagant speculations. "By his life"—the Christ life—said Paul, "are we saved."

The above fraternal words of mine, inspired by brotherly kindness, must not be construed as in any way antagonizing Theosophy or Theosophists. Furthest from it possible! We are brothers all, working like different religious denominations, by seemingly diverse means, and under different names, to educate and uplift all tribes and races. My heart is warm, and my hand open to every nationality, to every creed and cult that seeks to expand the mind, purify the affections, cultivate brotherhood, and better the condition of our common humanity, leading it step by step up the rugged steeps that open into the golden temple of unselfish love and a divine altruism.

I am, etc.,

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. Call or write us about your case. We give advice free and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Prof. Wilson's 100-page Dictionary of Disease, Free. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

NEW YORK.

Convention of the State Spiritualist Association, Held at Elmira, N. Y.

A reception was tendered the officers and trustees of the New York State Spiritualist Association by the local society. Short addresses were made by Moses Hull, Mrs. Mattie E. Hull, Mrs. Lewis Duhl, Mrs. C. E. S. Twing, Mrs. T. U. Reynolds, Mrs. M. C. Von Kanzler, Mrs. Lizzie Brewer, F. Corden White and your humble state secretary. This delightful evening resulted in our becoming acquainted with each other, and was a delightful beginning to the brief stay we made in this beautiful city. We met with a most cordial welcome by the local society, even though they did place our official medium and your state scribe in the hands of a policeman, but he proved a most genial and kind-hearted host and a very interesting family who looked well after our needs and comfort.

The first morning of our convention dawned clear and beautiful and a goodly number of delegates and members early gathered at the First Spiritualist Church. Promptly at 10:45 o'clock President Moses Hull called the convention to order with the entire board of trustees present.

The address of welcome and response were postponed till the evening session in order that the Ex-Mayor of Elmira might deliver the address, as the Mayor was absent from the city.

The president appointed the following committees:

Credentials—H. W. Richardson, Mrs. Lewis Duhl and E. G. Reilly.

Order—Miss M. J. Fitzmaurice, E. G. Reilly, Mrs. L. A. Holt.

Ways and Means—Mrs. C. E. S. Twing, Mrs. T. U. Reynolds and Birch Ellis.

Sergeant at Arms—Ira Smith, of Elmira.

Assistant Secretary—Mrs. Louise E. Zimmerman.

Mrs. Lewis Duhl, musical director.

Brief addresses were made regarding the work by Mrs. S. C. Ellis, Auburn; Mrs. M. E. Clark, Syracuse; Mrs. M. C. Von Kanzler, Elmira, pastor of the First Spiritual Church. A letter was read by the secretary from Clara L. Stewart, secretary of the Morris Pratt Institute, of Whitewater, Wis., followed by remarks from Mrs. C. E. S. Twing, Westfield; Mrs. J. H. R. Matteson, Buffalo; F. Corden White, Lily Dale; Mrs. M. E. Hull, Lily Dale.

Motions were carried allowing Mrs. Lizzie Brewer to act as delegate for the Syracuse society, and to allow Mrs. Matteson and Mrs. Sully to act for the Buffalo society.

Motion carried to allow E. G. Reilly to act as proxy for fourteen individual members forming an auxiliary society.

Motion carried to suspend article 4, section 3 of by-laws, by allowing Mrs. Mattie E. Hull to act as delegate for Jamestown society.

The afternoon session was called to order at 2 o'clock, and the president appointed committee on president's report: Mrs. T. U. Reynolds, Mrs. Lewis Duhl, E. G. Reilly, Mrs. L. A. Holt and Miss M. J. Fitzmaurice.

Secretary and treasurer's report: Mrs. Lewis Duhl, W. B. Whipple, Mrs. J. H. R. Matteson, Mrs. M. C. Von Kanzler, Mrs. L. A. Holt and E. G. Reilly.

Resolutions—Mrs. S. C. Ellis, Mrs. Lizzie Brewer, Mrs. M. C. Von Kanzler and H. W. Richardson.

Chairman Richardson, of Credential Committee, reported 42 members and delegates present.

The president's, secretary and treasurer's and reports on missionary work were received.

Reading by Miss Victoria C. Moore, of Dryden.

The president appointed as nominating committee, Mrs. Lizzie Brewer, Mrs. Lewis Duhl, W. B. Whipple, Mrs. J. H. R. Matteson.

Adjourned.

Invocation by Mrs. M. C. Von Kanzler. Solo by L. H. Emblem, of Elmira.

Reading, "Author's Night," by Miss Victoria C. Moore, of Dryden, N. Y.

Address of welcome, by Dr. Frank H. Flood, Ex-Mayor of Elmira, who in the absence of the Mayor from the city, bade us welcome to their beautiful city.

SATURDAY MORNING.

The convention was called to order at 10:30 o'clock by President Moses Hull, and Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, our veteran worker, was welcomed and made a brief address.

The committee on resolutions presented their report and the rest of the morning was taken up in the discussion and was continued for a part of the afternoon.

AFTERNOON.

The convention was called to order promptly at 2 o'clock, and about half an hour was used in further discussion of the resolutions, when they were adopted as a whole.

The committee on the president's report recommended its adoption, with a slight change, which was carried.

The committee on the secretary and treasurer's report recommended their adoption.

An amendment to the by-laws was presented by E. G. Reilly, of Syracuse, referring to auxiliaries, and a motion was made to amend the same by adding article 4, section 5, to the by-laws as follows:

"Whenever individual members of the State Association, residing in the same locality, shall unite as a social body auxiliary to, and for advancing the best interests of the Association, they may register with the secretary as auxiliary societies under sanction of the Board of Trustees, and when so registered for at least sixty days prior to an annual convention they may be represented by delegates on the same basis as other chartered societies."

Motion passed instructing the secretary, whenever he learns of any State Association being in session, to send greetings to such association.

The secretary read a letter from Clara L. Stewart, as secretary of the Michigan State Association, conveying greetings, and a resolution was adopted that the same be accepted and placed on file.

H. W. Richardson and Mrs. Milton Rathbun were unanimously elected to represent our State Association in the next annual convention of the National Association, to be held in Boston during the month of October.

There were two candidates placed in nomination for third delegate, Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing and Mrs. Harriet Duhl. There were 237 votes cast, of which Mrs. Twing received 128 and Mrs. Duhl 109.

There being no further business excepting the election, the committee on nominations, through its chairwoman, Mrs. Brewer, presented the following ticket:

H. W. Richardson, East Aurora, president; Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing, Westfield, vice-president; Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, Troy, first vice-president; Herbert L. Whitney, Brooklyn, secretary; W. B. Whipple, East Aurora, treasurer; Mrs. Laura A. Holt, West Potsdam, Mrs. S. Comstock Ellis, Auburn, E. G. Reilly, Syracuse, Mrs. Lewis Duhl, Elmira, trustees.

Mrs. Mattie E. Hull moved to place Mrs. Milton Rathbun, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., in nomination for treasurer. Also. Motion carried.

Mrs. S. Comstock Ellis refused to accept the nomination for trustee, and the convention substituted Miss M. J. Fitzmaurice, of New York City.

There being only one candidate for each office, excepting that of treasurer, a motion was carried to make those elections unanimous, and the secretary instructed to cast a deciding vote for such officers, excepting secretary, which vote was cast by H. W. Richardson. There being two candidates for treasurer, ballots were prepared, resulting in the election of Mrs. Milton Rathbun. There were 215 votes cast, Mrs. Rathbun receiving 107, W. B. Whipple 58.

Brief remarks were then made by the newly elected officers. A vote of thanks was extended to Mrs. Mary J. Newton, of New York City, for the gift of a bound copy of "The Spiritual Telegraph" of the year 1852; also a copy of the "Hartford Bible Convention," and sundry valuable pamphlets. A vote of thanks was also tendered to Rev. Moses Hull, our retiring president. This closed the business part of the convention.

SATURDAY EVENING.

The meeting was called to order at 7:45, and the first part was given to the Elmira society, with Mrs. Lewis Duhl in the chair, and was devoted to the dedication of the First Spiritualist Church and the installation of its pastor, Mrs. M. C. Von Kanzler, by the Rev. Moses Hull. The exercises were opened by instrumental music by McHenry's orchestra.

The charge to the church was made by Mrs. Mattie Hull.

After another selection by McHenry's Orchestra, H. W. Richardson was introduced as our incoming president, and took the chair.

Prof. Harrison D. Barrett, of Boston, editor of the "Banner of Light," and president of the National Spiritualist Association, made a short address; followed, after music, by spirit messages given by F. Corden White.

Adjourned.

SUNDAY MORNING.

Meeting opened at 10:30 with President Richardson in the chair.

Invocation, Mrs. M. C. Von Kanzler.

Address by Frank Walker, Hamburg, N. Y., followed by Mrs. Lizzie Brewer.

Congregational singing.

Address on "Love, Brotherhood and Success," by State Secretary Whitney, followed by address on "Anti-Vaccination," by Mrs. S. Comstock Ellis.

Benediction, H. D. Barrett.

AFTERNOON.

The exercises were opened with singing.

Mrs. C. E. S. Twing read a poem, "Our Martyred President."

Reading by Miss Victoria C. Moore, our talented young elocutionist, "The Prince of Peace."

Address, Mrs. Mary C. Von Kanzler.

Song, by request, Mrs. Lewis Duhl.

Spirit messages, Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds.

Benediction, Mrs. C. E. S. Twing.

SUNDAY EVENING.

Opened with singing.

Invocation, Mrs. T. U. Reynolds.

Spirit messages, F. Corden White.

Music by McHenry's Orchestra.

Address, Prof. H. D. Barrett.

President Richardson announced a message just received from President Norton, of California State Association, sending greetings to New York State Association.

Benediction.

This closed our Fifth Annual Convention, and then came the sad hour of parting, with the good-byes and handshakings with old and new friends.

We were royally treated by the good people of Elmira, who did everything in their power to render our brief stay in their midst as pleasant as possible.

Great assistance was rendered me personally in my multitudinous duties by my able and charming assistant secretary, Mrs. Louise E. Zimmerman, of the Elmira society.

The thanks of our association are also due to the McHenry Orchestra, Mr. L. H. Emblem, soloist, and our elocutionist, Miss Victoria C. Moore, whose readings were rendered in a most charmingly effective manner.

One of our old friends and State Association worker, was this year very conspicuous by his absence for the first time in the history of our five years' work, W. Wines Sargent, of Brooklyn, and many were the inquiries regarding him.

HERBERT L. WHITNEY,
Brooklyn, N. Y. Secretary.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

Will C. Hodge can be addressed at 40 Loomis street, Chicago Ill., for engagements. Will answer all calls for funerals.

Senhora Severo, widow of the Brazilian aeronaut, who recently lost his life in Paris by an explosion of his airship, said: "On the eve of the disaster my husband had a troubled dream. He dreamed he was in an airship above a cemetery. From the open graves arms were outstretched towards him. Among the dead he recognized his mother. He was much impressed by the dream and had a presentiment that an accident would happen to him. It happened, and just above the cemetery of Mont Parnasse."

Ellen Thomas Richey sends the following invocation: "Spirit of divine love, of omniscient power and wisdom, Mother and Father Nature in one, manifest to us through your angel forces. Let the inspiration of divine love and unity pervade our hearts and open our understanding. Fill us with the sweet spirit of charity, the saving grace of universal love. Let us feel that we are brothers to all universal life, whether typified in those of our earthly home or some other mortal or immortal kingdom of the soul of nature—God! May the vibrations of divine wisdom dominate our spirit. May the sweetest of all charity govern our intercourse with our fellows. Make us realize that true happiness is the birth-right of unselfishness. Manifest to us through those in immortal life who may be as guides and teachers to our footsteps. Make our thoughts pure and unselfish that we may attract the pure in spirit. And may divine love unite us in harmony to the Infinite."

F. C. Holmes writes: "I have received The Progressive Thinker, and thank you very much for the very valuable premium, Religion of Man and Ethics of Science. It can be put in the hands of investigators, and will be a great help to our teachers. I consider this book and Art Magic two of the best in my library."

G. W. Kates and wife will hold meetings in Lawrence, Kansas, June 15; Kansas City, Mo., June 22; Des Moines, Iowa, July 10 to 17; Clear Lake, Iowa, July 18 to 23. Address them at 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

W. H. Walz writes from Joplin, Mo.: "We prize The Progressive Thinker, as it is in the lead of all the Spiritual papers. The cause is drifting along smoothly here, but there is not the interest taken that should be. We have a society in the east part of the city, but no organized society in the main part of town, where it is really needed the worst. I have made a proposition to the East Side people that we open a lyceum for young and old. As the children of the Spiritualists are growing up in the orthodox Sunday-Schools, this work will all have to be undone here or hereafter."

W. E. Bonney started last week for England, his native home. He leaves behind him a host of warm friends who will wish him great success in his change of residence. He will probably lecture occasionally in England.

Mrs. A. Metcalf writes from Willoughby, Ohio: "In renewing my subscription for the tenth time, I am more and more convinced of the good your grand paper is doing. We seek for that truth which is the need of the world; and while there are represented 'the many men of many minds,' we feel it is a privilege to sift and absorb that which is fitted for our soul's need—that which broadens and uplifts our lives. The world is filled with those who hunger for this spiritual uplifting founded upon the rock of science, not the old creeds."

W. F. Schumacher, president, writes: "The Spiritual Church of the Students of Nature, Chicago, gave an entertainment, social and ball, on Saturday, May 17, at Armitage Hall, 910 Armitage avenue. The entertainment was given by the Humboldt Concertina Club, conducted by Prof. W. Nenermann. In spite of the rain the hall was well filled. After enjoying a supper and dance the party broke up at 4 a. m. in a happy frame of mind. The society added a neat sum to its funds as the net results of the enterprise."

Correspondent writes: "On Tuesday evening, June 24, Mrs. Maggie Waite and Mrs. C. B. Bliss will hold a joint seance in Haymarket Theater Building, 161 West Madison street. Mrs. C. B. Bliss is regarded as one of the best materializing mediums; for one year she gave her public seances in the Boston Spiritual Temple before thousands of people. Mrs. Maggie Waite needs no introduction; her name has become a household word. With two such mediums a good time is assured. Admission 50 cents.

The Weekly Budget, of New Zealand, says: "It is something in the nature of a rarity to have the opportunity of listening to the learned discourses of so ripe a scholar or so renowned a social reformer as Dr. Peebles. With a striking personality, a cheery kind nature, and a cultured address, the distinguished gentleman has charmed all with whom he has come into contact, and his visit here will long be remembered by many whose privilege it was to hear him. The Dunedin Psychological Society, to whom the public are indebted for the presence in these parts of Dr. Peebles, have acted with commendable foresight in inviting one so qualified to further their interests by opening the eyes of the public to the true nature and elementary principles of the great science of psychology. The attendances at the different lectures were large, and the greatest interest manifested in the matters referred to by the lecturer, who touched on many things of which the public have hitherto been totally ignorant. Needless to say, the results likely to accrue from the visit of the venerable apostle of Psychology will prove of a thoroughly beneficial nature, and should mark an epoch in the history of the society which should spring into a new existence as the crowning work of Dr. Peebles' mission. The energetic secretary deserves much praise for his kindness and courtesy in connection with matters pertaining to the Doctor's visit."

E. R. Kidd writes from Canton, Ohio: "While reading the many interesting articles to be found in No. 654 of The Progressive Thinker, my attention was called to the editor's remarks under the heading, 'The Spirit of Boycotting.' While the writer has never filled the office or editor of any paper, monthy, weekly, or daily, and would not care to do so, even if competent, yet he believes the remarks made on boycotting are timely, well made and filled with truth. That all of the articles published in the columns of any paper, spiritual or secular, will meet with the approval of those who read them is an unreasonable proposition, and why? First, all are not educated along the same lines, therefore do not see alike; their mode of thinking and likes and dislikes are different, and vary according to the education and temperament of the individual. Second, this world of ours is made up of a conglomerated mass of humanity, among which many 'cranks' are to be found, and it is that class which try to run the editor and his paper. Go on, Brother Francis, you are doing a grand work and editing a paper second to none, and I assure you that the level-headed, the unselfish, the better class of Spiritualists will help you fight the battle you have long since begun, a battle for right, truth and justice, and the grand principles to be found in the philosophy and phenomena of Modern Spiritualism."

S. P. Channell writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "In the letters published by you and written by Prof. Denton through the hand of that grand medium, Carlyle Petersilea, we have in detail what we all must surmise who watch the faces of the several parties concerned as we meet them on the street and elsewhere. These articles should stir every liberty-loving American to action. 'Man born free and equal!'—how that sounds to us in view of the facts. How can any man or woman knowing these things uphold them. It seems to me that none but fiends incarnate can, and I am sure that all that is needed to wipe this blot from our land is knowledge of the facts. You are doing a grand work, and that noble and liberty-loving soul, Carlyle Petersilea, deserves the gratitude of us all for his untiring efforts in the cause of justice and knowledge, for which he has given up all the good things of this world."

A. Willis writes from Cincinnati, O.: "I am holding meetings daily for materialization, and am among the oldest mediums for that phase, having been before the public for 10 years."

At the Englewood Spiritual Union, Hopkins' Hall, 528 West 63d street, June 15, 2:30 p. m., Dr. Burgess will lecture on Spiritualism among the American Indians. He will follow his lecture with psychometric readings. At 7:30 p. m., Harry Moore will lecture on "The Origin and Significance of All the Days, Including the Sabbath, or Lord's Day." Mrs. Gehring will follow with spirit messages and tests. June 22, at 7:30 p. m., Mr. Moore will lecture on "The Fall of Man from a State of Perfection, or Evolution, Which?" Mrs. Maggie Waite will follow with spirit messages and tests. June 29, at 7:30 p. m., Mr. Moore will lecture on "The Woman of Endor as an Ideal Character and Medium." A spiritual christening and confirmation service will obtain after the lecture. Flowers will be used instead of water. Spirit messages will accompany the services.

N. A. St. Clair writes from Toronto, Canada: "Oscar A. Edgerly has just completed his five months' engagement with the Toronto Spiritualist Association. Many regret his departure, as his lectures have proved a steady treat to his audiences. The thinking class of investigators were particularly catered to the interested. Mr. Edgerly handles well and clearly the solid and startling facts embraced in Spiritualism, and always holds the close attention of his audiences from start to finish. He is a fine lecturer, and a very genial man, who always makes many friends at all places where his engagements take him. He should be heard on every Spiritualist rostrum in the country, and no society should fail to secure his services when he has an open date. Mr. Edgerly may be addressed at 20 Public Square, Lima, Ohio."

L. M. Oles, Jr., secretary, writes from Allegheny, Pa.: "Surrounded by a number of their most intimate friends, at the home of the bride, Mr. G. G. Newcomer and Miss Catherine Luella Rein were united in marriage, June 5, 1902. Both Mr. Newcomer and Miss Rein are members of the Progressive Spiritual Society of Allegheny, where they have always proved themselves earnest and efficient workers for the cause of Spiritualism. In them we have cause to rejoice and our hearts go out in good wishes in this their newly begun life. The ceremony, although simple, was impressive, and as Rev. L. M. Oles, officiating, spoke of the angel friends, we could almost feel their presence."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond's engagements for the summer are: Chesterfield, Ind., Sunday, June 15; Corry, Pa., Sunday, July 6; Cuba, N. Y., (probably) July 13 to 20; Cassadaga Camp, N. Y., July 21 to July 31; Freeville Camp, N. Y., August 1 to 5; New Hampshire, August 5 until 25; Onset Bay, Mass., August 26 to August 31. Mr. and Mrs. Richmond remain at their home in Rogers Park, during June. They expect to attend the picnic of the Church of the Soul Sunday-school, at Glencoe, Saturday, June 28. The services of the Church of the Soul will be resumed September 14.

Lake Brady officials are trying to boom their camp by advertising a medium they had not engaged. Nellie C. Mosier writes: "I see that Lake Brady Association is advertised to open July 13, and my name is on their programme as test medium. I am not engaged there at all, and I am tired of being used as an advertising card in that way, and have people take me to task for 'disappointing them.' I have never been able to fill two places at one and the same time."

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley leaves Texas June 16 for a week's stay at her summer home, Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa. Her opening camp engagement is at Jenison Park, Mich., June 29 to July 5. She hopes to meet many of her Chicago friends at this place, as it will be a beautiful park to spend the Fourth of July at, and can be reached by boat or train from the "Windy City."

The Vermont State Spiritualist Association will hold its next quarterly convention at Montpelier, Vt., in Grand Army Hall, June 20, 21, and 22. After first session Friday, at 2 p. m., there will be three sessions each day. Vermont state speakers: Mrs. Abbie Crossett, Mrs. Emma Paul, Lucius Colburn, Alonzo Hubbard, Sarah A. Willey; and others are invited and expected to be present. In addition to the Vermont speakers the management have secured Mrs. Effie Webster, of Lynn, Mass., a good test medium and speaker, for the occasion. Good music will be furnished. Each session will be composed of an address and conference or seance. The object of these meetings is to better the condition of humanity by considering all themes that pertain to the true conditions of life, therefore all are invited to come and take an active part and help to make the convention a grand success. For further particulars inquire of E. J. Fallon, Montpelier, Vt., Chairman of Local Committee.

The following is a brief synopsis of Harry J. Moore's address on Sunday evening, June 8: "One of the greatest problems of all ages has been solved when Spiritualism comes forth and scientifically demonstrates that such men as Socrates, Paul, Swedenborg and the late Joel Tiffany, and such women as Joan of Arc and Mary A. Livermore were not deceived when they claimed to have heard voices, spoken, as it were, out of the distance of monition and instruction. It is easy in such cases for some people to allege insanity, but what kind of insanity is that, the only indication of which is the person automatically, as it were, hears voices which he or she comes to know by experience expresses larger knowledge and a higher wisdom than he or she is conscious of possessing? It is quite impossible for the opponents of Spiritualism to cudgel up a species of insanity having for its basis a properly applied intelligence. Almost without exception these voices have proven that their advice was in accord with wisdom. These men and women whom I have mentioned were and are of robust constitution, of physical health, of moral balance which is another strong point in favor of their sanity. Shall it be said that the men and women whom I have mentioned, a presentable combination of intellect and virtue, were and are, all through their studious lives victims of hallucination? Are their words and acts those of men and women insane? I say no, a thousand times no! My dear friends, these manifestations of spirit return are the culmination of the dreams and visions of all the past, and no power can take this truth from the world."

C. H. Mathews writes: "By a dispatch from Pekin, China, May 25, it is learned that a rich German firm failed to secure the exclusive right of selling opium throughout the Chinese empire, for which privilege the firm offered to pay the Chinese government $15,000,000 a year. It appears that 'the better class' of the ministers and the 'palace officials objected.' It is now remembered that more than three-fourths of a century ago the Chinese were living and moving and having their being, and were happy without the use of opium. John Bull saw that there was money in it, so that great Christian government forced opium and the Bible and the missionaries into China over the protests of the 'Heathen Chinee,' whom a good Christian poet says are 'peculiar,' 'which the same he is free to maintain.' Yes, they are 'peculiar;' they were simply minding their own business, something that these two great Christian monarchies were not doing. The blush of shame should mantle the cheek of these pious Christians every time they meet a 'Heathen Chinee.'"

Under the auspices of the Jenison Park Spiritualist Camp-Meeting Association arrangements have been perfected for the holding of daily services at that very attractive resort for six weeks during the summer, beginning June 29 and closing August 10. The officers of the association are as follows: H. W. Melenbacker, president; J. E. Walker, vice-president and manager, and A. H. Melenbacker, secretary and treasurer. Much effort has been expended during the past few weeks by these energetic and enterprising officials and all who attend, whether for one day or for the entire period, are assured in advance of being well entertained. Accommodations have been made for several hundred people and printed matter advertising the attractions is being widely circulated. The grounds are now easy of access through the fact that the Holland interurban line passes the main entrance. The boating, bathing and fishing facilities are especially good, and the hours between the morning, afternoon and evening lectures and demonstrations can be very pleasantly occupied. J. E. Walker, Macatawa Park, will gladly furnish additional information as to the detailed program and rates upon request.—Grand Rapids Past.

The circular of the Jenison Park Camp says: "Last, but not least, we will speak of the young mediums who have developed this God-given power and taken up the grand work of proving the immortality of the soul. First, I will mention Mr. and Mrs. D. A. Morrell, of Grand Rapids. Mr. and Mrs. Morrell sit together in their trumpet seances and get splendid results. They also give private sittings with their trumpet in the light. I cannot say anything too strong in praise of their work. Mrs. Morrell also delivers inspirational lectures, and will speak at our camp on the afternoon of July 16. Don't fail to hear this bright little medium."

Mrs. Nettie M. Wood writes from Houston, Texas: "Spiritualism is slowly but surely advancing in the Lone Star State. Houston has been favored with a visit from Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, who gave eight public lectures, followed each night by spirit messages given with such wonderful accuracy that each and every one were recognized beyond a doubt. Mrs. Cooley is an eloquent and forceful speaker, and as a test medium is far above what we usually see in Houston. She deserves a most cordial welcome wherever she goes. Our meetings are well attended, and we believe that by holding together, and working harmoniously much good will be achieved for the cause of truth."

The National Sunlight Center Club will hold its first basket picnic, on Saturday morning, June 21. Boat leaves at 9:30 a. m. Other clubs are invited to join.

Dr. G. N. Hilligoss, whose word none will dispute, says that the article on our fourth page, entitled "An Invisible Orchestra Plays," is true in all respects. We are delighted, Doctor, to have your confirmation.

J. Henry Ford writes that the statement in last week's poem by Dr. Wilkins, concerning "Our Hydesville Home" being in ruins is a mistake, and for the Doctor and his informant we gladly make the correction. Mr. Ford says he was in the Hydesville house, June 12, 1902, and talked with Mr. Hyde, who is now making thorough repairs, and aside from the new roof and a few new clapboards, the old house is just as it was fifty years ago.

H. N. Maguire writes from Spokane, Wash.: "Last Sunday evening, June 8, we held the first meeting of the re-organized Eclectic Society of Spiritual Culture. The hall occupied was newly carpeted, and neat and attractive. Notwithstanding the veteran and able trance speaker, George P. Colby, is now filling an engagement here, and is well appreciated, and another spiritual society is holding regular Sunday meetings, we had a fair audience. So you see Spokane is just now well supplied with advocates of the cause. Professor Jacob Grupp, well known in Chicago as a gifted psychometrist and true and faithful worker, assisted by his wife, is now identified with the Eclectic Society. Mr. and Mrs. Grupp will make Spokane their home for the summer, if not longer. They are well pleased with their new home. Your correspondents living in Idaho and Washington, who have been calling for missionaries, are requested to write to Mrs. Mattie Grupp, 306 E. Third avenue, Spokane, Wash."

F. P. Yeager writes from Flatonia, Texas: "Mrs. G. G. Cooley was with us the 2d and 3rd of this month. Such appreciation of an intelligent audience has been rarely felt. The text for the second lecture was taken from II. Corinthians, and such were the declarations and illustrations, and so beautifully was the physical and spiritual life portrayed in their correlative nature, that the audience was spellbound and seemed to inhale every vibration, so easily and sweetly propounded and explained as by One of Authority, that the lecture, although rather lengthy, was too short. The sister of your reporter passed out of this life on the 3rd inst. Mrs. Cooley kindly consented to perform burial services at the grave on the 4th. Words fail to define the beautiful thoughts that were given us in this sermon. The services were simply grand. Mrs. Cooley stirred up the community, and I hope to see her here again soon."

Jenison Park Camp, Mich.

I wish to inform the public through the medium of your valuable paper, that we are going to have a new camp-meeting in Michigan. This is, I think, proof of the great growth our cause is making, as this is the eighth camp-meeting that is being held in this State this season.

Now to describe our new grounds: It is in the most central place in Michigan, and has every facility that goes to make up a summer resort and camp grounds. In the first place, we have eleven acres, of which six acres are a perfect grove for tenting. The grove is on a point which extends out into Macatawa Bay and is within one-half mile of the great Ottawa Hotel, which covers three acres of ground and is the largest and best summer hotel in Michigan. We are also adjoining Macatawa Park, which has a 100-room hotel, and is run in first-class style. Macatawa Park is on the junction of Macatawa Bay and Lake Michigan, and all up the bay and down Lake Michigan for miles are splendid cottages, which are beginning to fill up with people from all directions.

Next, we have the greatest fishing and bathing grounds in Lower Michigan, and in the evening the bay is covered with lightning bugs in the shape of lanterns hanging to the sides of row boats in which are people fishing for white bass.

We have located on this beautiful spot because of the great facilities for all who may come to us, and because of the great number of resorters we hope to reach with our beautiful philosophy of truth, and we know that we are joining hands with the angel world in our undertakings, and hope to make this one of the spots on earth where the curtains of heaven are pinned back and where angels of light descend and prove to mortals that there is no death.

Now, regarding transportation, first, we have the Grand Rapids, Holland and Lake Michigan electric line, running from Grand Rapids, Holland and Saugatuck; then we have Pere Marquette running from every direction all over the state of Michigan to Ottawa Beach. Our steamboat will meet every train and bring passengers to our dock. This road will advertise our camp all along the line and our programs are in the hands of its agents for distribution. Next we have the Graham and Morton steamship line running from Chicago. Will leave Chicago every morning and evening and on Saturday will run an extra boat which leaves Chicago at 2 p. m. Parties wishing to attend our Saturday night hops should take this boat, as it arrives at our docks at 8 p. m. Those wishing only to attend our Sunday meetings can take the 8:45 boat which arrives here early Sunday morning and leaves Sunday evening at 11 o'clock, giving an opportunity to attend our three meetings and arrive home in time for business Monday morning. Those wishing to attend camp for a week or longer can get excursion rates. Next we have Pere Marquette steamers twice a day from Milwaukee, which will be advertised.

We have on our grounds several first-class cottages newly furnished, also a large dining-hall which will seat 200 people, that will be run in a strictly first-class manner, the same as everything else connected with our camp. We shall spare no pains to make this the greatest camp ever held in Michigan.

Our programs speak for themselves, and we extend an invitation to all and will do everything in our power to make it pleasant and profitable to all who attend. And to all good mediums we extend a special invitation and think we can safely say that all who come will have all the work they can do. Address all mail to

Words of Peace.

There is a gentle little lady living in this town, to whom the angels come, as they are reported to have come to the saints of old, and speak words of wisdom and peace. She declines to have her name published, but I am sure that if she would give her poems to the world they would be found very comforting and acceptable. Many of them in my opinion, are gems.

I send the following poem from her, not because it is one of her best, but because it was given me to do with as I like.

At the time she received this she scarcely knew me. Had only met me a few times. In relating her experience when it was given, she said: I was sitting on my back porch one warm summer evening, as I thought, all alone. The full moon poured its beams through vines and lattice work, the gentle zephyrs fanned my brow, a great peace came over my soul and I felt as if heaven were not so very far away, when suddenly there stood by my side a beautiful being who dictated the lines I now give to you.

She repeated the lines to me, telling me that the spirit who gave it said it was a message which she must repeat to me. As soon as she delivered it she forgot it, and when I desired her to write it for me she could not remember it, but one day, months afterward, the same influence appeared to her and gave her again the message. She wrote it down and here it is.

LAURA B. PAYNE.
Topeka, Kans.

A SPIRIT MESSAGE TO LAURA B. PAYNE.

It is the twilight hour, and my spirit roams far and wide,
To seek the dear ones that, so long ago, clung to my side,
So fondly, and with such a cheering trust
That my soul was strengthened to meet life's dreary day,
And to bear bravely its burdens, and to lift my share
Of the heavy load they were called upon to bear.

Dear Sister, to each and every one there comes a day
When the soul all weary, turns from the heavenly way
And dwells in sorrow's dark abode.
That it may gather anew
Strength to live unselfishly, to dare and to be
One of God's ministering angels on life's rough sea.

To you, my dear one, the bitter conflict has been long
And oft has your weary soul felt deeply the wrongs
Of him who should have shielded with tenderest care
And made of your life such a rich blossom of love
That its fragrance would have whispered of the Eden above.

But instead with a relentless hand, he tore the petals fair
And left them trampled and torn, to perish in despair.
But a Father's guiding hand, gently sought them again,
And fashioned them anew in a stronger design
That they might bloom again in His chosen time.

And, Dear Sister, they will bloom again in that garden fair,
Where all is peace, joy and beauty, so perfect and rare
That thy soul filled with its measure of gladness, will say,
Oh, Father, I thank Thee, for the crown that now is mine,
Each jewel once sorrow's cup, holds now Thy love divine.

Father, I thank Thee, for the past, by its light I see
That sorrow's dark labyrinths lead heavenward to Thee.
And the sighs of the past, the sweet symphonies that fill
My soul to the o'erflowing with such heavenly strains
That I hear not Earth's sad echoes nor feel its weary pain.

Off to England.

To the Editor:—For some time past it has been my desire to once more visit my parents who are still living in the old home where they have been for over fifty years, and where they have carried on a business for the same length of time. I have two sisters there also living with them, and circumstances have so arranged themselves that I am to go at once and assist them for a time in the business which I used to do in my boyhood days. I have bought a ticket from Montreal to Liverpool via Steamship Tunisian, of the Allan Line, sailing on June 14, at 3 a. m. By the time this reaches the majority of your readers I shall be well on my way, and will be in all probability paying tribute to Father Neptune and the finny tribe which are to be found in his great dominion. Being a peculiarly constituted individual, I have to pay a heavy tax for the privilege of crossing the ocean, in the shape of long-continued sea-sickness; however, I hope there will be enough of my material encasement left when I arrive on the other side for my friends to be able to see with their normal vision, I do not know that any of them possess clairvoyant powers, yet they may, but have very orthodox ideas about the next world.

The "Tunisian" is due in Liverpool on June 24, and I hope this time she will "get there" in good time. I do not suppose I shall visit King Edward or go to his coronation, but presume I shall hear something about it anyhow. This will be my fourth trip across the Atlantic, and I hope some day to make yet another, but circumstances render it difficult to determine just how soon.

After other matters have been attended to, I hope to come in touch with some of the societies in England and do something in the lecture field.

I trust the grand old Progressive Thinker and Brother Francis may long continue to extend their influence and help to scatter the seeds of eternal truth among benighted mortals. I also desire to extend thanks to Brother Francis for favors extended to me in the past, and also to all the friends I have met in my travels in the interest of Spiritualism; if I do not meet them again in mortal form, I hope to meet them in "the home over there." My English address: Monk Sherborne, Basingstoke, England. Mrs. Bonney and son Ernest are still at the old address, 1330 O street, Lincoln, Neb.

JEANNETTE'S VISION.

A Tale of Telepathy.

"Mother, I shall not return from school as early as usual to-day, for I have some extra work to do, so don't expect me until late," said Jeannette Trenholm, as she left her home one morning for her regular duties as teacher in the "2" school.

Jeannette Trenholm was the only child of a widowed mother, who, after her husband's death, and the settlement of his estate, was left with but a small annuity.

Jeannette had received a thorough education, and as she was still fresh in her studies, found no difficulty in securing a position in one of the city schools.

The mother and daughter occupied a small flat in an apartment building, and lived simply, but comfortably within their modest income.

It had been their practice to lay by a small sum each month as an "emergency fund," and, coupled with this was an ambition quietly held, though seldom spoken about, which was to save enough, if possible, for a trip abroad and a year's study for Jeannette.

The lessons of the schoolday were over, the children dismissed, and Jeannette, after resting a few minutes, commenced the work, about which she had told her mother in the morning.

A little more than an hour was consumed, and then, her task completed, and noticing that the sun was yet high in the heavens, she said half-aloud to herself, "I believe that I will write to George, and it is so much more quiet here than at home. I can easily finish the letter, and still be in time for dinner."

George Ford was a young friend of Jeannette, a civil engineer, who had about a year before taken a position with a company interested in Cripple Creek investments, and was at that time in Colorado in their employ.

George Ford and Jeannette Trenholm had met at the house-party of a mutual friend, and had known each other a little more than two years.

No spoken word of love had passed between them, but both recognized a nameless bond, stronger than speech, which would, they felt, lead in time to the fruition of their desires.

A close correspondence was maintained between them, in which, perhaps, as in no other way, the close acquaintance of their inner natures ripened into a frank interchange of thoughts and sympathies along life's higher lines.

Jeannette opened the letter she was about to answer, and turning to a paragraph, read over, very slowly and carefully these words:

"Do you believe, Jeannette, that the mind may act independently of the body? I have had a strange experience recently, in which I seemed to be with, and talking to you, as naturally as I ever did, and we were planning a trip abroad, and a sight-seeing tour together. That I was neither asleep nor dreaming, I am quite sure. If your next letter tells me that you are not altogether skeptical, I will write you the full details."

Jeannette laid the letter on the desk before her, and took up her pen. She had written about three pages, when a peculiar sensation came over her.

"I felt," she said, in relating her experience afterward, "as though my whole being were electrified, and then—my body ceased to be of interest for me. I seemed released from it, and my real, inner, conscious self was pulsing with the unutterable joy of absolute freedom, subject only to the law of attraction. Following that, I was drawn in a tangible line, clearly defined. I found myself in a mountainous region, and in a mining camp with George, who was watching by the side of a man lying upon a bed, and apparently ill. In some way this man held a peculiar interest for me, although I had never seen him before. He was past middle age, but remarkably strong and vigorous in appearance, save for the sudden illness which had come upon him. His features, too, wore a strangely familiar look, which puzzled and perplexed me. I tried to hear what they were saying, but could not catch the words, and just at this point I was aroused by the entrance of the janitor of the building."

Gathering up her things, Jeannette returned home, and told her mother of what had happened, and of the strange feelings which had possessed her. Something like a week passed by, during which she thought frequently of her peculiar experience, but always failed to explain it satisfactorily to herself.

About eight o'clock one evening, when Mrs. Trenholm and her daughter were sitting in their little parlor, the bell rang, and upon answering its call, Jeannette found herself face to face with George Ford and the strange man of her vision.

Joy and surprise struggled for mastery, giving way to utter bewilderment as her mother rushed forward with a glad cry, and was clasped in the eager embrace of the stranger.

"O, Walter Ritchie, my own dear brother," exclaimed Mrs. Trenholm in a transport of joy, "where have you been all these years, when we have mourned you as dead; and how is it that you are here to-night alive and well! Surely a miracle has come to pass!"

Explanations quickly followed. When Mrs. Trenholm and her husband left England for America, Walter Ritchie was in India, and as the Trenholms moved from place to place, all traces of each other were lost.

Mr. Ritchie had come to this country to inspect some mining interests, and whilst doing so, sustained a fall, which confined him to his bed for a few days.

To help him pass the time, George Ford looked in upon the stranger, and whilst in casual conversation it chanced that he mentioned the name of Trenholm. Mr. Ritchie's interest was at once aroused, and he was determined to follow the clew, however slight it might be, in search of his sister, persuading George to accompany him.

It was then Jeannette's turn to unfold the tale of her vision in the schoolroom, at which they all greatly marveled, in noting and comparing the accurate correspondence of facts.

Mr. Ritchie was a bachelor, and well equipped with this world's goods. He insisted that Mrs. Trenholm and her daughter should make their future home with him in England. To George Ford he entrusted the care of his Colorado investments, with instructions to sell them as quickly as possible, after which he was required to report to him in person, with an intimation that other plans would then be in order, in all of which George gladly acquiesced.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE
BY EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

Do you want to organize a society for the intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM
furnishes all you desire.

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.
It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth: not the old cup and pitcher Sunday-school.
It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.
THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a land of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.
Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. "Student": Q. How many Roman Catholics are there in the United States?

A. The growing preponderance of the Catholic church is one of the most threatening dangers which menace our free institutions. The Roman Catholics are prolific. It is a cardinal principle of its faith that the Bible injunction to multiply must be fulfilled, and to interfere in any way with this command is an unpardonable sin.

The Catholic directory makes the number of members of that church between ten and twelve millions. Non-Catholic statistics make the number eight millions. The Pauline Fathers, of New York, claim that the Mother church has within its folds more than one-half of all those belonging to any church—as there are 27,000,000 persons connected with the various churches if half of this number are Catholics, then there are 13,500,000. This is probably too large an estimate, yet it must be remembered that "once a Catholic, always a Catholic," and the babe an hour old, if it has received recognition by a priest is considered as truly belonging to the church as the pope himself.

Catholics in United States	10,000,000
Catholics in Philippines	7,000,000
Catholics in Porto Rico	1,000,000
Total	18,000,000

Our new possessions, thus by augmenting the colossal power of Rome, present more than a political problem for wise statesmanship, its religious factor is of most difficult elimination.

Mrs. Helen K.: Q. I am told in a prospectus that I have "lost my personal magnetism," and that is the reason why I am not successful in business matters however hard I try. This prospectus promises to restore my lost magnetism, and give me success in everything for a "lucky belt," costing five dollars. Another occultist promises to do this by a "magnetic ring" costing fifty dollars, and from $100 to $1,000 for instructions. Would you advise me to accept any of these offers?

A. It may be received as unexceptionally true that no one ever "lost" his magnetism, for it is impossible, and hence impossible for any one to restore it. The "luck belt," "magnetic rings," etc., are magnetic in the sense that they extract money out of the pockets of the credulous.

If the vitality is low, usually the magnetic influence is weak. To retore it to strength the general health must be improved. That is better than all the fifty dollar course of lessons, belts, rings and charms. There is no secret in animal magnetism or hypnotism. Everything known is given and fully explained in the numerous books on that subject, all of which can be had for the price of single "lesson." These "professors" can give you not one single idea outside these books. If you are tempted to believe you have lost your personal magnetism, don't you believe it.

If you are told that by a few five-dollar lessons you can have it restored, don't you allow the dollars to depart.

If you are being persuaded that a magnetic appliance will benefit you physically, mentally, don't you persuade. These appliance are constructed in defiance of the known laws of magnetism and electricity, and their value depends on their suggestions—a tow string will be just as valuable, if you have "faith."

If you are offered a diploma for cash, don't purchase, it will prove a delusion and a snare, for it is a valueless piece of parchment, which will give you neither recognition nor standing with the learned, and maybe make you obnoxious by inflaming your self-concent. If some "professor" or "psychic college" offers to give you a "course" for a hundred or two dollars, developing your magnetic or "hypnotic power" so you will be able to control any one you desire, in business, love, etc., don't allow yourself to be hypnotized into the belief that you will be able by such instructions, to become such a dangerous master. Could you, you would, however honest in the beginning, be led to crime; in fact the desire to possses such power, shows that at heart you are criminal. Had these "professors" a tithe of such power they would not be begging for lesson-takers. Don't allow yourself to illustrate and prove their assertion.

Occultist: Q. What day of the week was January 10, 1861?

A. Thursday.

E. T. Jahr: Q. Does the M. E. church use or confess the basic principles of John Wesley's teachings to-day?

A. The Methodist church is far less liberal than the Wesleys. It has dogmatized his generous living faith and conduct. The General Rules prepared by John and Charles Wesley for the societies which grew out of the movement and acceptance of which were the only terms of membership, did not contain a single dogmatic statement. A desire to be saved from sin; avoidance of vice; a desire to do good on all occasions; and to all men, are especially emphasized. He desired, as he expressly stated, that sectarian bigotry be absorbed in practical efforts. Wesley was liberal, earnest, and far beyond his own time, and it is to be regretted ahead of the Methodist church at the present.

Yet he is the accepted authority of that church, and its most orthodox preachers, assume that they are proclaiming his doctrines.

M. O. R.: Q. Is there any support to the belief that Friday is an unlucky day?

A. A careful inquiry was made in Germany through official channels, as to the week of 9,048 disasters. It was found that these were distributed over the days of the week with a uniformity which plainly showed that no one day was more unlucky than another. The number for each 1,674; 1,551; 1,631; 1,547; 1,638; 1,608; 269 for Sunday. Monday is the most disastrous, and Sunday the least, the small number being accounted for because of the lessened activity in business on that day.

Of a carefully collected memorandum of crimes, and accidents, referable to the individual and the elements, preserved by the writer, of 686 cases, 104 occurred on Monday, 110 on Tuesday, 98 on Wednesday, 100 on Thursday, 93 on Friday, 103 on Saturday, 72 on Sunday.

The superstition of unlucky Friday has come down from remote times and been received without a thought given to the subject. It is because the people do not think, or think in worn ruts, that such beliefs remain as a lingering shadow of the ages of ignorance.

G. R. Bicknell: Q. I am in a troubled state of mind about reincarnation. It is claimed that the manifestations are produced by the "shell" of the objective mind and after a time this will dissolve and float away; the phenomena being only transient, earthly shadows. If we are reincarnated over and over, and cannot remember anything of the past, what good is it?

A. Possess your soul with patience and utter disregard of the doctrine of reincarnation. It is a speculation, or attempt to account for spiritual phenomena of remote antiquity, and has no place in modern thought. Spiritual science is as far from these old theories, as geology is beyond the six days' creation of Genesis. But as there are yet those who believe in the "elixir of life," in "transmutation of the baser metals into gold;" still those who labor at a "perpetual motion," in defiance of the well known laws of force, so are there many who advocate some one or more of the exploded theories of the past, and will continue to do so, until the race advances beyond the recurrence to more or less remote ancestors which Darwin called atavism.

The fact that the doctrine of reincarnation is ancient is proof of its being untrue, for the older a doctrine the greater surety that it is false.

SUPERSTITION VS. COMMON SENSE.

There is a legend, (so we read)
Of how this world was made;
And Superstition with its creed,
Has little sense displayed.

This superstition has a God
Of anger and of hate;
He rules the world with iron rod—
This God so good and great.

God had a son, of woman born—
No father—what a loss
He was the object of much scorn—
Was hung upon a cross.

Between two thieves. The story goes,
This Christ, our brother, died
To save mankind from countless woes,
And all their sins beside.

Now it is strange that one who knew
From the beginning all,
Should make his plans, and they fall through,
And first was Adam's fall.

And so it happened that poor Eve
Upset all of God's plan;
If we the story must believe,
'Twas she who ruined man.

And ever since when man does wrong,
A woman is to blame;
That is the burden of their song—
Methinks it is a shame.

That one who was so wondrous wise,
Should plan things in this way,
And make Eve father all the lies,
That's told from day to day.

Grand Thomas Paine led men to use
A little "Common Sense;
And bid them dare to disabuse
Their minds of such pretence.

He stepped out nobly to the front,
And dared express his view,
And never faltered, as was wont
When death its arrow threw.

Then tiny raps were heard one night
Four and fifty years ago;
They brought the proof that brighter light,
Upon the world should glow.

To lift man up from the abyss
Of Superstition's thrall,
To save himself, and doing this,
We find some good in all.

Warned of Danger in a Dream.

Oscar T. Palmer, who came on a visit to Chester sometime ago, and who left for home suddenly, saying that he was sure his family was in great danger, wrote to a friend in Chester giving him the following story, which the friend tells:

"Mr. Palmer, it seems, dreamed that his home was on fire and that his wife came running out with one of the children, and that just as she came out part of the roof fell in, blocking the way to the room where the three other children were.

"Here, he awoke in great terror and came to my room," continued Palmer's friend, "and knocked against the door and he told me the entire dream. He insisted on leaving for his home immediately. When he got there it was dark and he, indeed, found his house on fire. He shouted and this awoke his wife and children. And just as in the dream, she came out with one child and immediately the roof fell in.

"Palmer is an athlete and with the greatest difficulty he succeeded in climbing the lightning rod to the second story and then walking along a narrow ledge to the window of the room where the children were entrapped, he smashed in the window and entered. He took one of the children and climbed out and edged his way back to the lightning rod. By this way he brought the second child out; but the third time he had to jump from the second story; and in trying to save the child he broke his leg."

The house of Mr. Palmer was saved and now he is able to get about on crutches. He firmly believes that the dream was a divine message.—Chester (Pa.) Times.

"Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism; or a Concordance of the Principal Passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism; together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible." IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

FRAU ROTHE'S FLOWERS—"A PROBLEM."

Among the vast amount of correspondence in connection with the "Bothe Case," none is to me so extraordinary as a paper contributed to the Spiritistische Rundschau by Professor Sellin, and headed "A Problem." I will give the facts without comment—only remarking that it is now evident that at least on one occasion the flowers given to the sitters at a seance with Frau Rothe were purchased at a flower shop.

The facts as given by Professor Sellin are, as briefly as I can give them consistently with strict accuracy, as follows:

Early in the month of August Frau Rothe and Herr Jentsch, after a trip in the Swiss Alps, went to Zurich on the invitation of Herr President Sulzer, an old friend of Frau Rothe, to give three seances there. Professor Sellin stayed at Herr Sulzer's residence, while Frau Rothe and Herr Jentsch put up at the Hotel Falkenstein. Professor Sellin made the necessary arrangements on Thursday, August 8, for the seance to take place at Herr Sulzer's on the following day. Now for the events of that day.

In the morning Professor Sellin went by steamer to visit a friend at Kusnacht. On his way to the boat he encountered Frau Rothe and Herr Jentsch, who were tempted by the beauty of the day to accompany him on board a little before eleven o'clock. They returned to Zurich by the next boat, while Professor Sellin did not leave Kusnacht till half past three.

Frau Rothe and Herr Jentsch (according to their own account) reached their hotel at 12:15 p. m., had their midday meal and retired to their respective rooms a little after one o'clock. Frau Rothe says she removed some of her clothing on account of the heat, and lay down and went to sleep; she was awakened by Herr Jentsch knocking at her door at two o'clock, when he told her that he was going out for half an hour to fetch letters from the post.

Herr Sulzer called to conduct them to the place where the seance was to take place, and by four o'clock most of the party were assembled. At five o'clock the seance was to begin. At Frau Rothe's request she was searched by two "old ladies," who took off her garments, except her chemise and drawers. Herr Jentsch was likewise searched by young Herr Sulzer, and afterwards took his position in an adjoining room, with the door open, where he took down the "protocol" in shorthand.

At the seance, which began at 5:25 p. m., the usual phenomena of trance speaking and apports of flowers—gladiolas, roses, cornflowers, etc.—took place; the dewy freshness of the flowers being especially remarked on by Professor Sellin. In short, the seance was quite successful.

But now we come to the "Problem," and for obvious reasons it is best I should give this in Professor Sellin's own words:

"So far, all was as usual. In the meantime something had occurred which somewhat changed the "behind the scenes." At thirty-three minutes past one—the time was exactly noted at the time, therefore, when Frau Rothe had been for a quarter of an hour resting in her room, and was presumably asleep, she was seen by a Herr W. (with whom she was acquainted, and who had invited her to lunch two days before) at a spot about four minutes' walk from the hotel, with a paper bag in her hand, which apparently contained flowers. Why Herr W., who was only a few steps distant from her, did not greet her, he is not able to say. * * Instead, however, of doing so, he crossed over the way, and a few seconds later looked across to the other side, but Frau Rothe had disappeared. Here I must observe that I accompanied Herr W. to the exact spot, and am convinced, from the situation, that for even a quick-walking person to get out of sight so rapidly would be an impossibility.

"Herr W. communicated these facts to some of the persons who had been invited to a second seance on Sunday, August 11, and this created so great an atmosphere of mistrust that the seance was—and must have been—an unsuccessful one.

"Neither Herr M. nor myself had been informed of the occurrence, and it was only on the day of the seance I heard something of it, and on the Tuesday that I had a letter informing me that the flowers produced at the seance at Herr Sulzer's had been bought at a shop in the neighborhood, and that suspicion of fraud had thereby arisen."

Professor Sellin goes on to give his reasons why the flowers could not possibly have been brought to the seance, although he acknowledges that there is no doubt whatever that the flowers were the same as those purchased at this obscure shop. He conducted Frau Rothe there himself, and the shopwoman immediately recognized her as the person who had bought the flowers of her at the time specified. Frau Rothe said she had never seen the shop before. One of the reasons given by Professor Sellin why it could not have been Frau Rothe "in flesh and blood" who bought the flowers, is "the assertion made by Herr W. that Frau Rothe wore a dress which I know she had not with her."

The solution of the problem which Professor Sellin arrives at is that it was Frau Rothe's double, or astral body, which went to the shop and purchased the flowers, and he writes:

"I have expressed my doubts about it being Frau Rothe in flesh and blood who bought the basket of flowers at Hamburg" (when she was seen coming from a shop with a basket of flowers before a seance). "Now, in the light of this recent event, the matter becomes quite clear. I had previously imagined the possibility of an astral wandering; my own experience now almost forces me to accept it. * * For my part, I see no other solution of the question than to accept the fact of the actual action of the astral body, with the assistance of the Intelligences."

I must not further dwell on this part of the article, but will devote a few words to the account of the third seance and the extraordinary events preceding it. This seance was arranged to take place on August 14, at Zollicon, near Zurich. On account of the suspicion excited by the aforementioned incident, Professor Sellin took up his abode at the Hotel Falkenstein to keep watch over Frau Rothe. He says he locked her into her room at night after supper, and fetched her himself to breakfast the next morning; then he took her with him to give some invitations for the afternoon seance. They returned to the hotel about eleven:

"While I attended to my correspondence in Herr Jentsch's room, Frau Rothe, who was sitting on the bed, fell into a cataleptic state. In a few minutes this was broken by a trance communication from her principal control, who said that this state had been induced by them in order that her astral body might go and make preparations for the seance, that is, fetch the flowers and set them free. At 11:30 Frau Rothe awoke, fresh and cheerful, out of this condition, which had not lasted more than a quarter of an hour. * * After our dinner together, Frau Rothe lay down on her bed at one o'clock and went to sleep. I rested on the sofa at the same time, but did not sleep. Afterwards we drove together to Zollicon.

"Before the seance, Frau Rothe was searched by four ladies, who undressed and re-dressed her entirely. Herr Jentsch was likewise searched by three gentlemen. * * The seance was one of the most brilliant and successful I ever witnessed. * * Over two hundred flowers of various kinds were seized by the medium, mostly high over the table. In one word, it was a test seance with such undubitable phenomena as must have satisfied the severest critic. This is shown even more clearly by the detailed protocol. Here I close my hurried account, though I could willingly add a list of a dozen events which took place in the presence of myself and others, not at the Zurich seance—apports, direct writing, proofs of identity, etc. But sapienti sat. The facts have spoken, let men do the thinking.—C. W. Sellin.

THE SOULS OF SUICIDES.

Hamlet, in his soliloquy on Suicide, exclaims, "To be or not to be; that is the question."

And that is the question. If death be annihilation—if conscious existence terminates with the dissolution of the physical body—if then becomes merely a question of ethics or of social economics, whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, or to take up arms against a sea of troubles and by opposing end them."

But what if there be no death; what if bodily dissolution is merely the transition of the man into another state of conscious being? The revelations that have come to me lead me to agree most emphatically with the melancholy Dane that, "In that sleep of death what dreams may come, when we have shuffled off this mortal coil, must give us pause."

For a number of years it has been my privilege to work with invisible missionaries, through the instrumentality of a lady gifted with the necessary phase of mediumship, for the rescue and enlightenment of wanderers, sleepers and dreamers in the "outer darkness." During the past year another lady has been developed into a most extraordinary trance medium, and the invisibles have been using her also in their earnest and arduous labors in behalf of unprepared souls. The experiences that have come in this way comprise a revelation of the Borderland difficult for me to contemplate calmly.

It has been impressed on me that death—which is at the same time the birth of the spirit—is a most delicate process, the natural order of which may not be violated without entailing deplorable consequences. Violations of Nature's process give birth to abortions and monstrosities on the spirit plane the same as on earth. Innumerable, almost, and certainly unimaginable, have been the calamities of the Borderland brought to us for rescue and treatment. And among the most wretched were suicides.

I have learned to divide the souls of suicides into four general classes, namely: 1. Those who have fallen into the torpor which is often the consequence of a sudden or violent death. 2. Those in whose mind the act has become a fixed idea, imprisoning them in the thought of the deed. Ignorant of the fact that they have passed through death, time has ceased for them, and they are immured, as it were, in a perpetual and horrible present. 3. Those whose minds have become obsessed by some hideous nightmare growing out of the deed. Persons who have severed themselves from the physical body in a sudden frenzy are apt to be hurled into the spirit world with the dream that they are rushing wildly through the streets, or along an endless road, or through a desolate wilderness. Weary to the utter extreme, they are still unable to stop, until, perchance, they are drawn within the magnetic influence of some earthly medium; for they of themselves are powerless to stay the automatic activity of the mental mechanism they so heedlessly set in motion. On earth the mind may "wander," but, save in cases of cerebral disease, its automatism is checked by means of the physical body, which, with its arbitrary relation through the senses to the external world, serves as an equipoise between subjective and objective states. In the mind world, however, the soul's only protection against the mechanical action of the mental faculties is the power of its will, and this power—so majestic in its ultimate possibilities—it is hardly necessary to remark, is oftimes sadly lacking.

The fourth class comprises those who have fallen into what might be called the normal condition of suicide, if it be permissible to apply the term normal to what is altogether abnormal. To the clairvoyant vision this condition first presents itself as a heavy black cloud, which, being penetrated, reveals a mass of creatures herded together by affinity of thought and deed in what to them is a veritable dismal swamp. This is the external reflection, through the operation of the law of correspondence, of their mental and spiritual state. These poor souls have awakened to the knowledge that "there is no death," and have experienced the fundamental spiritual truth that peace and contentment are the product of inner harmony and cannot be achieved by any change of mere external relationship and environment. They have experienced this momentous fact of the inner life, but alas! they have not learned its significance. In vain they grope in the darkness of their ignorance; in vain they wander wearily through the foul morasses which represent and are the outgrowth of their bitterness and despair.

By means of thought transference and telepathy many persons on earth are brought closely en rapport with this sphere of suicide. Sad to say, its influence on the thoughts of men seems to increase in these days of reckless abandon and complacent sophistry. Philosophy and hysterics are often confounded.—H. Forbes Kiddle.

Spiritual Songster.
By MATTIE E. HULL. Thirty-eight of Mrs. Hull's sweetest songs, adapted to popular music, for the use of congregations, circles and families. Price, 10 cts., or $6 per hundred.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

THE AGE OF REASON By Thomas Paine. Being an investigation of True and Fabulous Theology. A complete edition of 180 pages, post 8vo. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Koran Commonly called the "Alkoran of Mohammed." The standard Arabian or Mohammedan Bible. Cloth, $1.00

Church and State. The Bible in the Public Schools; the New "American" Party. By "Jefferson." Third edition; 28 pages. Price, 10 cents.

CONFLICT Between Religion and Science. Just the book for progressive thinkers. A book that is very interesting to people who have a taste for the past religious history. By John W. Draper. Price, cloth, $1.75.

MAHOMET, THE ILLUSTRIOUS. By Godfrey Higgins, Esq. This work is one of the Library of Liberal Classics. No author was better qualified to write an impartial and honest life of Mahomet than Godfrey Higgins, and this volume is intensely interesting. It should be read in conjunction with Gibbon's work. Price, 25 cents.

COSMIAN HYMN BOOK. A collection of original and selected Hymns for Liberal and Ethical Societies, for Schools and the Home. Compiled by L. K. Washburn. This volume meets a public want. It comprises 258 choice selections of poetry and music, embodying the highest moral sentiment, and free from all sectarianism. Price, 50 cents.

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY. Lectures by the Swami Vivekananda, on Raja Yoga; or Conquering the Internal Nature, and other subjects; also, Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, with commentaries and a copious glossary of Sanskrit terms. Revised and enlarged, 12mo. Cloth, $1.50. Raja Yoga is an ancient system of Indian Philosophy, and one of the four chief methods that the Vedanta Philosophy offers to obtain freedom and perfection. Swami Vivekananda became a familiar figure in several American cities during the three years following the Parliament of Religions at Chicago; he was cordially received in America, where the breadth and depth of his teachings were soon recognized. His teachings are universal in their application. The book is cheap at $1.50. For sale at this office.

SYNOPSIS OF LECTURE

By Mrs. Florence E. B. Shaffer, at Houston, Texas.

Mysticism, our subject to-day, is the doctrine of the mystics; and the doctrine of the mystics is that of professing and expressing the purely sublime in spiritual ethics; of living a wholly disinterested and devotional life; having direct communion with the higher spirit forces, and acquiring a knowledge of truths unattainable by the intellect alone. Mystery ceases to be mysterious when once understood; and so knowledge, when gained, may be recognized or expressed by or through any term best suited to the students conception. Herein will be found the origin of all written thought or vocal expression; and light, otherwise, understanding, alone gives weight to speech. A cask or barrel may be securely made and fastened so all light is excluded. It may be filled with darkness, as a result of the light being excluded; yet we say, it is empty; and little force is exercised in lifting it. Likewise, the human intellect, of that capacity, whatever it may be named through the exercise of which we gain knowledge, may, through prejudice or bigotry or some kindred weakness, be so effectually sealed against all efforts toward enlightenment on the part of earth's wise ones, as to leave the mind in total darkness; and similarly, the very emptiness of such minds prevent their words from carrying weight with them when uttered in the hearing of educated people.

In the name of universal freedom, then, let him whose work proves he has done a little independent thinking, be given the right of classifying his spiritual hero as Jesus, Buddha, Confucius, Socrates, Zoroaster, or by any title meaning to him the most of light and truth and holiness. The entire doctrine and subject of mysticism has, by modern teaching, been adjudged to belong solely to the Oriental religions; and especially to Brahmanism and Buddhism. Looking into this claim briefly, let us notice that the world's most enlightened scholarship has traced the origin of the Christian scriptures back to the same source whence the Persian, Indian and Egyptian religions were drawn. We have not time to-day to furnish proofs for this statement, but every one can find them if he or she so desires. And just here let us notice the translation by Sir William Jones—the greatest oriental scholar now living, and for many years an English judge in India—of the holiest verse in the Vedas, which are the Hindoo scriptures. "Let us adore the supremacy of that spiritual sun, opposed to the visible luminary, who illuminates all, from whom all proceed, and to whom all must return. Oh, direct us aright in our progress toward thy holy world."

Many people whose chief weakness consists of a terrible inflation of the mentality over what they fancy they know, affect a certain contempt for oriental terms, and for all truths expressed through Eastern, and particularly the Sanerit tongue. Such only succeed in advertising the fact that they are not informed along these lines of thought; and especially their ignorance of the science of philology. The average person who, reading, finds words from a foreign language introduced into the English, and being familiar with it but superficially, should, in justice to himself, pause and consult some standard vocabulary; thereby enriching his own store of knowledge, besides sparing himself the humiliation of exposing his scant laboratory of thought.

Raja Yoga, for instance, is an expression or term frequently encountered now-a-days by students of higher thought; and if passed over in the superior (?) mental exaltation common to those who rely upon others to do their thinking for them, it will generally be disposed of thus: "Oh, that is only an old heathen term, worth nothing to me. I'll study those I already understand." Alas, this attitude of mind never leads beyond the old ruts worn smooth by the millions already passed that way. The term "Raja" means king; one of the titles given Jesus, the hero of Christianity; and its inner or occult meaning is, power, dominion, good, etc. "Yoga" is derived from a root word in primitive speech, and signifies "joining." The simple, English translation or interpretation of the compound term, "Raja Yoga," then, is, the conscious joining or uniting of the individual spirit with the One; or the First Great Cause, name it as you will. The Hebrews speak it Jehovah, the Persians sound it Ormuzd, the Christians say God, etc. All meaning to the speaker identically the same principle; and what Sunday-school child but is instructed that this is the same thought uttered by Jesus when he said, "I and my Father are One?"

The truth is, pass over in the density of our supreme ignorance as we will these wondrous truths enclosed in terms through which the world's early writers sought to express their thought, the fact remains, that twenty-five hundred years ago, when Europe, and particularly England was groveling in the mire of barbarism, great teachers in the Orient were penning those mighty truths which to-day, classified under differing names, illumine the races of mankind so far as illumination extends. We read, also without understanding fully, mighty truths framed into, and expressed so far as possible in our mother tongue; but we fail in perceiving that it has all been drawn, truth as well as expression, through the writings of enlightened races who attained great heights of knowledge and passed away.

Nor is this all. In every primitive tongue, thoughts have been voiced for which no corresponding term of expression exists in our own English language. Take an instance very near our own day and time, though the case is reversed. In the French language, no term is found conveying the deep thought revealed in our loved word, "home." "House" is its nearest synonym; and a house, as all know, is not always a home. French speech here failing to express the depths of thought the English does so well, the simple comparison illustrates how much richer one tongue may be than another, as to its capacity for revealing or liberating the precious forces locked up in their particular sounds. Relative to our entire language, however, flexible and adapted as it is to the translation of foreign tongues, we, in turn, are bitterly impoverished in those forms of sound which set free the sealed-up fountains whence flow the mighty floodtides of ideas, these, again to be transmuted into sound-forms indwelling where, many of the despised expressions from the so-called "dead languages" are resorted to for the unfoldment of thought, even by our best English scholars.

Mysticism, which is essentially Spiritualism, in as much as it would be nothing at all unless spiritual, has we repeat, by modern professed scholarship, been long relegated to the sepulcher of those same dead (?) languages; but the voice of true, spiritual philosophy, trained by the exercise of living the truth as found within its meaning, enables its devotee to-day, to stand beside the grave wherein these grand and redeeming truths lie hidden in the wrappings of a long ago past, and shout with a voice of mighty power, "O Truth, O Wisdom, come forth." And lo! the eyes that are willing to see and to ears willing to hear, immortalized forms rise up singing praises and glorifying their Creator, while words of supernal wisdom fall from their lips; proving, indeed, the resurrection from death.

By the way, the story of the resurrection as told in the Christian scriptures, has to do, not with rising from the graves, but of rising from the dead. Quite a difference; since many may be dead and not in the grave at all. Besides, the clearest reference to the dead which can be found in our own sacred writings, relate to being "dead in trespasses and in sin," and not to the mere death of the body; as the self-styled interpreters of religious teachings would have their hearers believe.

Let us learn to study instead of reject each new view of what at least may be a valuable truth sent to us from the great invisible, and sent, doubtless by some special messenger for our enlightenment, if we can but cast off our own grave cloths sufficiently to realize that we are capable of being resurrected from the death of our own ignorance.

Atheism.

If any man who congratulates himself on the decline of Atheism lays the flattering unction to his pious soul that a greater proportion of the people now than formerly believe in the God of Israel, he must do it by sedulously closing his eyes to palpable facts.

To believe in the God of Israel or of the Bible, we must believe the Biblical narrative in toto and in a literal interpretation. If we disbelieve any part of the narrative it is atheism to that extent. And if we interpret scriptural writers in the light of a scientific knowledge they did not have, thus making them mean what they did not mean, that again is atheism.

If you lengthen the six ordinary days into six long periods, that is atheism, for it is not what Moses meant. In the state of scientific knowledge then he could see no necessity for it. Nor could he see any incongruity in saying the sun and stars were made to give the earth light; for they do incidentally serve that purpose. That we are not wrong in these positions can be proven by orthodox church people themselves: for they regard liberal church people as atheists because they interpret in the light of modern science and reason, making the scriptural writers mean something that is not in a plain construction of their language.

An hundred years ago the God of Israel was accepted in lump, or rejected in lump. The atheists were over on one side; the believers on the other, and you could count heads. Now, very few reject the moral or ethical side of the Biblical narrative in toto—only they insist that other "sacred" books have an ethical side equally good. While, the moral or ethical side of the Biblical narrative is about all the liberal churches do accept, Christ being for them a great moral teacher rather than in any other special sense the son of God, and the biblical writers "inspired" as ethical teachers only and not in scientific historical and speculative matters.

Indeed when the liberal churches have done eliminating from the biblical narrative, there will be little of the distinctive characteristics of the God of Israel left. Hence the liberal churches are in a great measure atheistic as to the God of Israel, but not atheistic as to God. And orthodox Protestant churches are gradually taking on the liberal spirit.

Is it the scientific and rational spirit of the age which forces them to it, or has "inspiration" taken on a new and broader cinch? It does not matter which, if we are drawing nearer the truth.

Prof. Lockwood's Essay.

To the Editor:—The intelligent Spiritualist and thinker could not help being deeply absorbed and interested in the learned and philosophical disquisition of Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood, in The Progressive Thinker of May 24, 1902. It will well repay any of your readers, particularly those classed as "Christian Spiritualists" (and there are many of them), to study on the difference, with a great distinction, between Science and Religion. It would be hard, indeed, to make it any plainer.

The remark attributed to Voltaire, that "One of the lovely proofs of religion is that it is unintelligible," has great weight and clearness. Yet, as Prof. Lockwood says: "Let the thinker think. The fact that these monstrous dogmas have given birth to 328 distinct hybrid religious schemes, * * * is further evidence of their pagan origin, and of their persistent adherence to pagan methods of demonstrating the superiority and divinity of their respective religions."

Another clear-headed writer says: "For once admit the 'creation' theory, that all things were made from nothing, and it is possible for the mind, by successive steps, to reach at least many of the conclusions held to be essential to a good orthodox faith." And he cleverly suggests that "On so-called theological questions, the greatest safety lies in the least amount of thinking."

Prof. Lockwood beautifully says: "While Spiritualism contains none of the features of religion, its system of synthetic ethics transcends in beauty and eloquence of thought the progressive possibilities of the human soul in the realm of spirit life, far beyond that voiced in any religion, or outlined by mortal pen."

In the fourth column of his article the printer errs in referring to "the experiments of the immortal Lavoisier and Sir Humphrey Day" [Davy] one of the most eminent chemists that Great Britain has produced.

BOOK REVIEW.

Searching for Truth. Peter Eckler, publisher, New York, N. Y. 582 pages. Price, cloth, $1.50.

This is a book of the free-thinking class, clear, compact, concise, and evidently the product of a master mind, though the author's name is not given. His views on Bible teachings will appeal to many minds as eminently sensible, highly suggestive, and indicative of fearless thought. It shows the unwisdom of many Bible teachings that are so widely regarded as the words of infallible wisdom.

Love's Coming of Age. A Series of Papers on the Relations of the Sexes. By Edward Carpenter.

The quality of this book is designated by his statement that woman's position is not likely to be improved until she is able to face man on an equality; "to find, self-balanced, her natural relation to him, and to dispose of herself and of her sex perfectly freely, and not as a thrall must do."

Published by The Stockham Publishing Co., Chicago. Price, cloth $1.

Money. Its Nature and Functions. A Logical Historic and Economic Treatise on Its Uses and Abuses. By Charles Bousall, Salem, Columbiana County, O. Paper, 25 cents; cloth 50 cents.

Creeds Outgrown. A Lecture by Rev. Andrew P. Stout, Sheridan, Ind. Paper, 20 cents.

Interesting as showing the growth of a minister from old-time orthodoxy into the larger and brighter faith of higher criticism and Spiritualism.

Not Hypnotism, but Suggestion. A Lesson in Soul Culture. By Henry Harrison Brown, San Francisco, Cal. Paper, 25 cents.

It is evident the author has read Hudson's "Law of Psychic Phenomena," though he does not, as Hudson does, make a labored attempt to upset Spiritualism. It is a work that the intelligent Spiritualist can study with physical, mental and spiritual profit.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, May 18, at Clarksville, Mo., Wm. D. Boone aged 70 years. Mr. Boone was a blood relative of the famous Daniel Boone, and possessed in a marked degree the rugged honesty and fearlessness of character that distinguished that great pioneer.

Though an outspoken Spiritualist for many years, Mr. Boone was a leading manufacturer and business man and enjoyed the unqualified respect of every man, woman and child in the orthodox community in which he lived.

His funeral was largely attended and the writer improved the opportunity to impress upon the multitude the beauty and reasonableness of the philosophy by which the deceased had lived and died.

W. F. PECK.

Passed to spirit life, Miss Bertha Hassmann, age 23 years, daughter of Mr. W. Hassmann, the vice-president, and Mrs. N. Hassmann, the treasurer of the Spiritualist Society Students of Nature. Remains taken to Graceland for burial, June 7.

MRS. M. SCHUMACHER.

Passed to spirit life at her home in Woodlawn, Sterling, Ill., June 10, Hannah, wife of Samuel Albertson, in her 83d year. In her home her husband and grand-daughter, who have lived with and lovingly cared for her in her last illness, will sadly miss her patient, helpful presence, but are conscious that her spirit will abide with them. The Albertsons were originally Quakers, but have been faithful, earnest Spiritualists for nearly fifty years. A large assemblage attended the funeral which was conducted by the writer.

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M. D.

Chicago, Ill.

Passed to spirit life, from Andover, Ohio, June 5, 1902, Mr. D. F. Mun, in the 51st year of his age. He leaves a wife and two sons to mourn his loss. Services were conducted by O. P. Kellogg, who was kindly assisted by Rev. Mr. Jones, a Methodist minister.

MRS. O. P. K.

J. H. Foote, my husband, passed to spirit life, June 10. He was a firm believer in Spiritualism, and passed away in that full belief. His sickness was severe, one year and a half of suffering. He longed for relief. I feel he has it now, and cannot wish him back.

MRS. J. H. FOOTE.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You This Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing; and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Father Tom and the Pope,
Or a Night at the Vatican.
Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "puttecn," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar, and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachymalchrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Neethar Itself, it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his episcopical mouth wid the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents.
